

LIBRARY ST. MARY'S COLLEGE

Frother Leo

St. Mary

HANDBOOK TO TENNYSON'S WORKS.

GEORGE BELL & SONS, LONDON: YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, AND NEW YORK, 66, FIFTH AVENUE. CAMBRIDGE: DEIGHTON, BELL & CO.

A HANDBOOK

821.81 L962

TO THE WORKS OF

ALFRED LORD TENNYSON,

BY

MORTON LUCE.

AUTHOR OF "NEW STUBIES IN TENNYSON."

WITHDRAWN

LONDON:
GEORGE BELL AND SONS.
1895.

LIBRARY ST. MARY'S COLLEGE

2208

CHISWICK PRESS: -CHARLES WHITTINGHAM AND CO.
TOOKS COURT, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON.

PREFACE.

THE Preface to the First Edition of "New Studies in Tennyson" read as follows:

"This little book is intended to precede, possibly by several years, a much larger work which has long been in course of preparation, and which will contain complete commentaries on 'In Memoriam,' 'Maud,' 'The Princess,' and 'The Idylls of the King,' together with critical and explanatory notes on all the other writings of the late Laureate."

Although this "Handbook to Tennyson," which retains a few extracts from the preliminary "New Studies," may serve in future years as a companion volume to the larger undertaking mentioned above, it has nevertheless been designed as a Complete Introduction to the Works of Tennyson for the present use of the general reader, as well as for the requirements of schools and colleges.

The whole of the poems have been brought under review; and they are considered as nearly as possible in the order of the Table of Contents prefixed to the one volume edition of Tennyson's works.<sup>1</sup> The number in

<sup>1</sup> "The Complete Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson," With a Portrait, Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. Macmillan and Co., London. brackets gives the page of that volume on which the poem will be found.

In preparing the present work of wider scope the author has kept within view some principles expressed in the Introduction to "New Studies in Tennyson":

"It has been the main object of the writer to stimulate the higher emotion and to cultivate the finer imagination of the student, rather than to check the growth of these artistic faculties by an accumulation of unsympathetic facts. . . . Some help the student and the general reader must have, and the commentator has merely to see to it that the information he offers is of the right kind. The author, many years ago, met with a series of magazine articles entitled 'How to look at a Picture;' with their aid he was able to discover and appreciate in any good painting a thousand beauties hitherto concealed from his most careful gaze. Possibly, then, the following Chapters may help some student or casual reader to look at and listen to a poem."

To the above it may here be added that in this more comprehensive volume evidence has often been brought forward in support of criticism; and space has sometimes been given to details for the purpose of ascertaining the truth.

The author's best thanks are due to Mr. W. J. Lias, of the Downs School, Clifton, late Scholar of Jesus College, Cambridge, for his kindness in revising the proof sheets.

Upper Belgrave Road, Clifton, September, 1895.

CONTENTS.

		PAGE
P. I.	, TENNYSON'S LIFE, TIMES, AND CHARACTERIS-TICS
II.	"POEMS BY TWO BROTHERS," "TIMBUCTOO,"
	"THE LOVER'S TALE"	-
III.	. "POEMS, CHIEFLY LYRICAL," 1830; OR, "JUVE-
	NILIA"	67
IV.	. THE VOLUME OF 1833; OR, "THE LADY OF
	SHALOTT AND OTHER POEMS"	109
V.	. THE VOLUME OF 1842; OR, "ENGLISH IDYLS
	AND OTHER POEMS"
VI	"Enoch Arden, and Other Poems"	201
	. "THE PRINCESS"
VIII	. "ODE ON THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF WEL-LINGTON," AND OTHER POEMS	259
IX	. "In Memoriam"	282
	. "Maud"
XI	. "IDYLLS OF THE KING"	319
XII	. "BALLADS AND OTHER POEMS"	362
XIII	. "TIRESIAS AND OTHER POEMS"	375
XIV	The Dramas	398
	", "DEMETER AND OTHER POEMS"
XVI	. "THE DEATH OF ŒNONE, AND OTHER POEMS"	430
	CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE	439
	INDEX	445

ANDBOOK TO TENNYSON'S WORKS.

1087

CHAPTER I.

TENNYSON'S LIFE, TIMES, AND CHARACTERISTICS.

PART I.—LIFE OF TENNYSON.

THE hero and the bard is gone." By this first line of ode that celebrates Byron as a hero, but has little say about his poetry, we are reminded that there have en poets whose mere lives were poems, and whose etry was the House of Life built to music. As we ght expect, such poets are rarer in our less eventful ys, when, if the leaders of thought gain something from interrupted study, they yet, according to Milton, also be something:

"The wisest, unexperienced, will be ever

Paradise Regained, iii. 240-1.

What Milton means by "unexperienced" may be thered from the context; and many years before, in

"On the Death of Lord Byron," in "Poems by Two Brothers." gned A. T. in the ed. of 1893.)

plainer prose, he had set forth the doctrine that a poet's education, if nothing more than "studious and contemplative," is very incomplete. It must have a living share, he says, in events that stir human experience widely and to the depths.

Of course we can never separate a poet's work from his life, however sequestered and contemplative that life may have been; but if only this, for example—if Tennyson had been more frequently compelled to breast the blows of circumstance, he might have become a more powerful poet and a greater dramatist.

On the other hand, we lost Chatterton altogether. Sometimes the stars above us seem to govern our conditions, and poor Chatterton failed to grapple with his evil star. Possibly, therefore, we may rest well content with Lord Tennyson's long life of ease and seclusion content also to read his biography not so much in the pages of history as in his own poetical work, where it is clearly written, interesting and instructive.

There is yet one other consideration. The words "more frequently," above, were used advisedly. Circumstance did deal Tennyson one blow, and that a terrible one, and while he was still young; and the shock of it was diffused through all his life. But though this private sorrow gave some power and some passion to his poetry, and brough him closer to the hearts of his countrymen, it left him without that wide knowledge of men and things which fel to the lot of Shakespeare and Milton; perhaps it ever tended to keep him apart from some of the might activities of a rapidly growing nation and a world-advancing era.

We have mentioned incidentally that Lord Tennyson' life may be read in his works; we may now add that hi poems are undoubtedly his best biography. Nevertheles it is useful to recall the glimpses which recording friend have given to us of the great poet as he moved through e, at that stately distance, to a resting-place where the canest of his fellows may now stand near his dust.

Alfred Tennyson was born on August 6th, 1809, the ar which gave birth to two other great men, Darwin d Mr. Gladstone. His father, Dr. G. Clayton Tenson, was rector of Somersby, a small parish in Lin-Inshire.

Alfred was one of twelve children, and the third of th brothers, most of whom have written poetry; two of s elder brothers, Frederick and Charles (afterwards arles Tennyson Turner) being poets of some note. His her died in 1831, but his mother, who will be mentioned ain in these pages, lived to see her son famous. ennyson's childhood was uneventful, but such as allowed n to be nursed by Nature, to observe her ways, and to re her; and it encouraged the growth of fine emotion, ough at the same time it helped to render the poet iring and sensitive. From the time that Alfred and s brother Charles left Louth Grammar School in 1820 lfred was then eleven and Charles thirteen) until they ere both entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1828, ey were educated at home-or rather, they were often it to educate themselves; a piece of good fortune that ls to few in these days when, as the schoolmaster in r. Davidson's play confesses,

"I, for food,

Have made myself a grindstone, edging souls

Meant most for flying."

The early flights of these affectionate poet brothers are frequent and free and far; their wits were not arpened with the knife that had cut their wings. Thus came to pass that they were led to all the Castalies, d fed with the milk of every Muse; and thus it further me to pass that after six years of this almost perfect etical apprenticehood, they published at Louth (1826-7) to now famous "Poems by Two Brothers."

For this collection of boyish verses the venturesome publisher gave them 71° m cash, together with three pounds' worth of books. The "Poens," found very few purchasers and fewer readers. But on the copyright of the same book 7° to was subsequently paid; the original manuscript was sold in December, 180°, for no less than 7° 150°, for no less than 1° 150°, and at about the same time bookseliers were asking £24 for a copy of the precious volume.

From one point of view these particulars are somewhat enclanchedy; for they may be regarded as a mournful ustration of a reflection in "In Memoriam," Ixxv. 4 They are yet more inclanchedy on this account; the book as we shall see hereafter, contained no pieces of great promise, nothing that could compare, for example, with the early work of Chatterton.

The date printed on the title page of this notable solume is 1825. Lord Tennyson refers it to the yea before,

We now lose sight of Charles Tennyson who, as stated thove, entered Trimty College with Alfred in October 1828. At the same trace, bery, then in his eighteent year, Arthur Henry Hallam went up to Cambridge, and he and Tennyson soon formed a lasting triendship. Bot were competitors for the Chancellor's price poem of 1820, the subject being "Timbrateo," and the prize fee to Tennyson. But Hallam's attempt was remarkable a perially for a man-so young nearly two years younge our his triends. Like Tennyson he broke through the additional year of this college exercise, and his work am considering has a given promose of the futurearch less trustworthy form Tennyson's. Hallam was wonderful and a good man; two it exercises of these finite hall be ailested to limb here. Tenny on spoke of his larger, "as now males here."

being "a near perfection as train might be," as Mon-kton Wilnes wrote. "We are diproved, not only a Leloved treash of the little confusion, but of a mo se and influential counsellor... and of the example of the who was as much before us in everything clse as he now in the way of life.<sup>n1</sup>

In 1830, while he was yet at Cambridge, Tennyson iblished in London, "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical," a book at aroused criticism, mostly favourable. During the mmer of the same year he journeyed in company with allam to the Pyrences. After the death of his father in 31, Tennyson did not return to Cambridge; but Hallam mained at the University till 1832, when he took his gree. In spite of this, the two triends continued to see a od deal of each other, and there is in "In Memoriam" description of one of the visits paid by Hallam to the mersby rectory. In the year 1832, Tennyson pubhed his second volume,' entitled "Poems," which owed a considerable advance upon the first. Hallam, no had been studying law in London, travelled to the ontinent with his father in 1833; his health had for me time been delicate, and while abroad he was seized th a sudden and tatal illness, and died at Vienna on ptember 15th. On January 6th, 1834, his remains were erred at Clevedon.

The loss of his friend, together with some adverse ticism of the 1853 volume, kept the poet almost silent paraly ten years. But all this time he was preparing a wings for a smer flight, the volume of 1842; and ring these years some part of "In Memoriam" was litten. His life at this period may be left to the words. Margaret Fuller in a letter of August 1842; "Much so he thought, much suffered." Though the poet was tactually compelled to get his living by treading some ugher road than the flowery walk of letters his means researty. We hear of him living "in poverty with his ends and golden dreams."

<sup>1</sup> See also "In Memoriam," cix-exiv.

<sup>2</sup> lxxxix.

<sup>8</sup> Dated 1833.

These friends included the foremost men and women of letters. Many of them he met in London, where the Cock Tavern was a favourite haunt, as he seems 1 to tell us in "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue." His place of abode was often changed. In 1837 the Tennyson family left Somersby,2 and after living at High Beech, Tunbridge Wells, and Boxley, they removed to Cheltenham, where they remained till 1850. In that memorable year Tennyson published his "In Memoriam," was appointed Poet Laureate in succession to Wordsworth, married Emily Sellwood, and with her took up his residence at Twickenham. Here Hallam Tennyson was born, August 11th, 1852. In 1853 the poet removed to his famous retreat, Farringford, at Freshwater, where Lionel Tennyson was born, March 16th, 1854. This was his home until 1867, when he purchased the estate of Aldworth in Sussex. There he resided for the remainder of his life, though for many years he continued to spend the winter and spring at Farringford. He died on October 6th, 1802.

Such is the outline of a life that appears somewhat commonplace; yet is it truly wonderful, most wonderful in what may best be called its completeness. Certainly, as we have seen, it wants the earnestness, the austerity, the strenuous effort which Milton associates with the life of the ideal poet; yet in some respects it is so ideally perfect as to be almost bewildering. The poet lisped in numbers; he won the prize poem at his university; he published poems while yet in his teens; he published when more than fourscore years old. Though he was not always inclined to kiss the rod, no writer profited more by the discipline of adverse criticism, and from the outset he was accorded approbation of sufficient authority to save him from despair, if not from self-distrust. His life was one long service of song, yet was there in it a period of years (1833-1842) with just enough in them of mystery, suffering, romance, and dealings with the world to thaw the ice of regularity. He was a most learned man, and with that a wise man. He was happy in his family, his friends, his friendship, his fortunes. He received a pension from the State and he was made Poet Laureate. Oxford bestowed on him its proudest token of esteem, the honorary degree of D.C.L. He had the privilege of refusing a baronetcy; he had the privilege of becoming a lord. An honoured son succeeds him in the peerage. Though heir of all the ages, he produced work that was strikingly original. He excelled in lyrical, monodramatic, and narrative poetry; he wrote a long and beautiful poem on a subject of almost national interest, and one that so many poets before him had attempted or thought of attempting; then he produced several important dramas. Poetry seemed to wait upon his dying bed; 2 he was buried in the Poet's Corner of Westminster Abbey. In life he secured what most great men have missed in life-a meed of praise; only in one thing might it be said that he fell short of fruition, for death alone could tell him how much he was loved.

&lt;sup>1</sup> To a fastidious taste it is healthier and sweeter to avoid the wine and tobacco of modern biography or novel,
<sup>2</sup> "In Memoriam," c, ci. cii,

PART IL-TENNYSON'S POSITION IN THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH POETRY.

"Man is man, and master of his fate," is among Tennyson's earlier doctrines. In later years it assumes the form "Man can half control his doom." 1

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Idylls of the King."

&quot; "His proud head pillowed on Sha'tespeare's breast."-SWINBURNE.

<sup>3 &</sup>quot; Marriage of Geraint."

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," couplet 139.

Even the poet, most independent of men, will be moulded in part by circum tances. He cannot altogether stand aside from his age. And in order to know lum thoroughly, we should first learn something about the times to which he was born.

If we look back through the centuries of ble and letters, we shall hardly fail to notice how often the literary period connects itself with some important phase of national life; and we also find that a great poet almost universally represents a great historic age.

Speaking roughly, and with especial reference to English poetry, the times of Tennyson were preceded by three important periods.

The first period has Chancer for "morning star," Shakespeare for moonday sun, and, to repeat Tennyson's figure, Milton for evening star. If we assign dates to it, they are 1350–1675, though given in such round but convenient numbers they overlap. A central date would be 1600, and a central historical epoch the reign of Elizabeth. This, the first period, and especially the first part of it, has the characteristics of youth; it has fresh ness, beauty, strength, and joy. It includes much of the making of our composite Fig. h. race, it evictory in the stringgle for existence among races; new freedom, a new world, new learning, and along with that, the religious, political, social, and literary influence of the lighte. No wonder that such an age should give birth to our two great poets, Shakespeare and Milton.

The next is a period of reaction, dating roughly from 1650 to 1750, leading names being Dividen, Pope, and Johnson, and a central epoch the reign of Quality Anne. Its characteristics are well marked, its posts appeal to the intellect rather than to the emotion at the onlot prose; the book of poetry, but they put into a the onlot prose; the book of humanity and the book of nature are ike closed to them; they deal with the limited and often etty life of "society" and "the town;" their fancy dom attains to imagination, nor their wit to humour; ad they mostly affect a satire whose pungency is butter ess rather than saltness. Their poetry affords pleasure some people, but it is pleasure of a low and scarcely an tistic order, such pleasure as we derive from watching clever chemical experiment, or a game of chess, or the eight of hand of a juggler, or from listening to the outhing of a mob orator in Hyde Park Even in the re great poem of this school, Pope's "Eloisa to Abelard," ir emotional attention is too often distracted by mere icks of conscious rhetoric.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot; Dream of Fair Women," stanza 1.

Nothing could be more natural than a new rise in petry after such a decline or rather, a new birth after ich a death. It was due to many causes; such as, in story, the Declaration of Independence and the fall of e Bastille.

Its literary origins are numerous; among them are e romantic movement in Germany and the writings of oltaire and Rousseau, preceded by others in England. here is a general return from artifice to art, from the own to nature, from society to mankind, from intellect to notion, from philosophy to romance, from politics to the rople, and, with one or two exceptions, from satire to ve. Cowper appears as the morning star of this new iv, and Keats is its evening star. But while Cowper is carer to the age he heralds than Chaucer was to the Elizaothan epoch, and represents many of its elements, Keats spirit stands faither apart than did Milton. Scott, like eats, seldom looks beneath the surface of the life of his vn day; he lives rather in a past of romance, and Keats a past both romantic and classical. Burns, standing r Scotland, reflects in his poetry many of the new notions of the new era.

Of the others who are more closely identified with the stir of the time, Wordsworth was the wisest, Byron the strongest, and Shelley the sweetest singer. Another to be named with these, one who bequeathed to Tennyson so much that is precious in poetry, was Coleridge—musical, mysterious, beautiful, capricious.

Among notable features of the new poetry is a certain looking forward, sometimes eager, sometimes wistful, sometimes sublime. It is a feature of Tennyson's poetry. Byron, Shelley, and Wordsworth might well turn their faces towards the other distance and the hues of promise; the French Revolution behind them was an exhausted volcano with a desert of ashes around. It had introduced no new principles; at best it had merely directed attention to principles already existing; but even that use of it was made barren by excesses and by the subsequent disgust of right-minded men. It would have been better for the world, perhaps, if these new principles had arisen not as a destructive volcano in France, but as a well-spring of water in England; indeed, just as Tennyson was becoming an author, those waters, after being pent up for half a century, gushed forth from English ground, cool, pure, and refreshing.

Like the French Revolution, Byron was furious to pull down, careless to build up. Yet even his misanthropic eye looked onward to a time "When the heart and the mind And the voice of mankind Shall arise in communion." These are almost the words of Tennyson ir "Locksley Hall." To the French Revolution Shelley was

"As the last cloud of an expiring storm, Whose thunder is its knell."

Adonnis

He had striven to redeem the present, though he found greater hope in the future; and these offices of love and trust were part of Tennyson's inheritance from Shelley ne bequest of Keats,1 who knew not of these things, was luxurious dallying with external beauty. But the poet om whom Tennyson received the laurel wreath gave m also the goodliest gifts of song. It was Wordsworth's ivilege to learn the lesson of revolution twice, for he ade verses in 1790, and wrote good poetry after 1830. the first of these lessons he has left us full record.

<sup>1</sup> Couplets 64 and 65.

After saying

"Let us . . . Leave this unknit republic to the scourge

Of her own passions," repeated the words of Daniel,

"Unless above himself he can Erect himself, how poor a thing is man"; us he laid bare the secrets of failure not of the French evolution only, but also of all such revolutions; and then, respect of the future, he added-

> "We live by admiration, hope, and love, And even as these are well and wisely fixed In dignity of being we ascend."

ne other aspect of Tennyson's four great predecessors ust be carefully borne in mind in any attempt to estimate e relation in which they stood to their own time and to s; neither Byron nor Keats announces that high concepon of poetry and the poetic function which we associate ith many great poets, and which possessed Tennyson most as much as it possessed Milton. Neither Byron or Keats could have said with the fervour of Shelley,

> "Drive my dead thoughts over the universe, Like withered leaves, to quicken a new birth." Ode to the West Wind.

> > " I will be wise

And just, and free, and mild, if in me lies Such power; for I grow weary to behold The selfish and the strong still tyrannize Without reproach or check." 2

<sup>1</sup> See also p. 54.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cf. Tennyson's "The Poet,"

Nor with Wordsworth,

"I would give utterance in numerous verse
Of Truth, of Grandeur, Beauty, Love, and Hope,
And melancholy Fear subdued by Faith."

**Recluse**

From such a passage as this last we may learn what Wordsworth was to Tennyson. We might almost hear Tennyson's reply,

"So did he speak;
The words he uttered shall not pass away....
No—they sank into me, the bounteous gift
Of one whom time and nature had made wise."
Recluse.

Such were Tennyson's predecessors, foremost figures in the great poetic era of Revolution; their writings enrich the years that lie near the beginning of the nineteenth century, some five-and twenty on either side.

The lull that followed the Revolution storm was of short duration. The very year of Tennyson's first volume was the year of the second French Revolution and the second English Revolution; the year of the "Three Days' in Paris, and of the appearance of Lord Grey as Prime Minister in England and champion of the Reform Bill It was the year of the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway. Mr. Huskisson, who met his death or that occasion, had recently brought forward the first notions of Free Trade, which the beginnings of steam navigation were soon to do much to develop. It was the year of Lyell's "Principles of Geology," and of Comte's "Cours de Philosophie Positive." Keble's "Christian Year" had been printed in 1827; in 1820 Catholic Emancipation had be, ome law; and forthwith O'Connell begar to agitate for the Repeal of the Umon. The position of the Irish Church was called in question in 1831; and in the same year the Corn Law Rhymes of Ebenezer Elliot eached more powerfully than from any pulpit a new octrine for the poor:

> "It is the deadly Power that makes Bread dear, and labour cheap."

t this time rick-burning was rife,1 and Hunt and Cobbett ere filling the new-forming mind of the masses with eas of social equality, while the most autocratic of uropean nations, "that o'ergrown Barbarian in the ast" 2 was absorbing Poland. The year of Tennyson's econd volume passed the Reform Bill, brought out Tracts for the Times," proposed to emancipate slaves, w Faraday's experiments in Electricity, and heard eorge Combes lecture on popular education.

Thus we find in the years of Tennyson's first two olumes something more than the germs of "all the onders that would be:"3 political reform, social reform, digious reform; the retreat of old religions before the vasion of new religions, religions of inquiry, doubt, egation, emotion, art, philosophy; and, most maryellous, ost potent of all, the "Fairy tales of Science" that were ow being told on every hand. Truly a great poet was rossing the threshold of a great age.

We need not follow him through that age; for its roots e, all of them, in the years just described; and the istory of the next sixty years, in their relation to Tennyon, may almost be summed up by a mention of the two itanic forces taking birth that were to influence his life nd work more powerfully than all the rest together - new eligious inquiry and the doctrines of Evolution.

But we in our year of 1895 may look back and see those ivty years of future as they lie in the tract of the past. et us survey them from the poet's standpoint in the econd Locksley Hall. It is something like Words-

<sup>1</sup> To "Mary Boyle," viii. ix. x. Also "The Princess," iv. 363-367.

Sonnet, "Poland."

<sup>3 &</sup>quot;Locksley Hall," couplet 60. . 4 Ibid., couplet 6.

worth's case over again; some enthusiasm for a mighty present, followed by distrust and disappointment, but not by despair; and then the final faith—" Onward." <sup>1</sup>

PART III.—CHARACTERISTICS OF TENNYSON.

Although the characteristics of a great writer often colour his writing to such an extent that when dealing fully with his literary work we describe the whole man, yet it is useful to regard them apart; and, further, to arrange them under separate heads, provided we understand that the distinctions are more or less arbitrary, and that qualities assigned to some special department may at any time cross their borders.

I.—Personal. Of Tennyson's form and feature nothing need be represented here; his fine head is familiar to all who possess his poems; and this is but a guide-book to be taken up by those who are travellers through that region of wonder and delight known as "The Works of Tennyson." A more accessible full-length portrait of the poet might, however, be desirable.

What is true of a man's physical frame is also true, but in a less degree, of his habits and his character; they will vary at different periods of life. Nor is the testimony of friends always to be relied upon. When we have read Mr. Theodore Watts' assertion that "Tennyson had that artistic egoism which enabled him to work upon his own lines in defiance of all hostile criticism," we are confronted by Mr. Knowles, who assures us that Tennyson was hurt by criticism as a sensitive child might be hurt by the cross look of a passing stranger; and the same authority repeats Tennyson's own remark, "The Reviews stopped

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the last poem of the last volume, "The Death of the Duke of Clarence," lines 14-17 (page 350 in the one volume edition); and in "Lockslev Hall Sixty Years After," couplet 140.

2." Among this and similar conflicting evidence, we must do better than rest content with the testimony of ree great men who knew him in his youth, manhood, and e, respectively. Arthur Henry Hallam, "My other art, and almost my half self," writes of his friend in 32, "I think you would hardly fail to see much for love well as for admiration." Next, Thomas Carlyle, most en to observe character, spoke of him in middle life as a true human soul to whom your soul can say 'Brother." he third tribute shall be that of Robert Browning in the ar 1880,—"I have loved you dearly."

Turning now for a moment to look at the poet as he pears in his poetry,—and, we must add with some emasis, in his prose—we seem to discover a somewhat ghter man. To those who have gazed long and lovingly will now and then betray a foible or disclose a weakness. Hese minor blemishes are fully considered in an Appenax to this chapter, p. 49.

To the foregoing remarks we may now add a suggestive in as to Tennyson's character first supplied by Hallam in 132. "His nervous temperament and habits of solitude we an appearance of affectation to his manner, which is not an interpretation of the man, and wears off on further nowledge." We may fairly adopt this as a final estitate in regard to any personal weakness that may be steeted in the poet's work, merely making the reservation that, as explained in the Appendix, it applies somehat less closely in this literary connection.

II.—Religious. Given a general vagueness incidental the idealizing tendencies of an imaginative writer, ennyson's religion, as we gather from his works, was a ligion of transition. If he had been asked to state the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, first, when "Poer by Two Brothers" were published, and again, "mo than half a hundred years" later, when he wrote the stanzas to Mary Boyle, his two statements would have seemed strangely at variance. For if we may judge from the "Poems by Two Brothers," his views in 1827 were the "happy views" of poem xxxiii. of "In Memoriam;" are in the volume of 1889 will be found the poem to Mar Boyle, which contains the following stanza:

&quot;The Princess."

There are exceptions. Milton's trumpet, even in poetry, gave out no accretain sound; nor did it spoil his organ music; it was as the trumpetop in an organ. So clear was never so musical.

"What use to brood? this life of mingled pains
And joys to me,
Despite of every faith and creed, remains
The mystery."

But the transitional quality of Tennyson's religion wa not uniform; it included oscillation and regression; an if we now rapidly follow the course of his religiou opinions as it runs through the long series of his poem we must first bear in mind the fact that with on or two exceptions we have no means of ascertaining precise date. The year on the title-page of a volum serves as a limit in one direction only. For example, i the "Demeter" collection, "Crossing the Bar" is printe last of all the poems,2 but the date of its compositio may have been earlier than that of such other pieces a "Vastness," "By an Evolutionist," and "To Mary Boyle. We could not even speak of all poems in the last volume as representing the thought of the poet not earlier than the date of the volume which preceded it; it contains, fo example, "Mechanopilus," which is referred to the time of the first railways. Therefore the following quotation which illustrate what have been called oscillation and regression of religious opinion must be read with the caution due to absence of exact date.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;To Mary Boyle."

<sup>2</sup> It is now placed at the end of the one volume edit. In f To resen's poems 5 "The Death of Œnone, Akbar's Dream, and Other Poems."

The "early heaven and happy views" may be said to we received their first shock at the university, where the quiring minds of many associates set Tennyson also quiring; and in the manner habitual to him throughout s career as an author, he takes occasion to utter through e lips of a fictitious character just so much as he chooses his own emotions, and the result is "The Supposed onfessions of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind." It would em that the epithet "second-rate" has its origin in nother characteristic of Tennyson, already noticed, and Iled by some critic "unfortunate modesty;" and Hallam ell says of this poem, "The mood portrayed is rather e clouded season of a strong mind, than the habitual indition of one feeble and second-rate." It is the mood, e may add, which at some time or other has clouded early every other strong mind from that day to this.

In this poem references to Scripture and to many points Christian doctrine included within "happy views" are ade in a manner totally different from that in the "Poems Two Brothers." The poet has begun the battle of neteenth-century uncertainty; he has begun to fight his oubts. ("In Memoriam," xcvi.)

In many other poems of the earlier volumes, the Bible quoted partly through "childly wont and ancient use," artly in a spirit merely artistic; examples would be the atter fire" of "The Kraken," the "strange angel" of To ---," the "Like Stephen's" of "The Two Voices;" which may be added

"There is a hand that guides."-Princess.

ut these and many others like them must be passed by. Meanwhile, as in "The Two Voices," Philosophy has een called in as an ally by both sides; and Evolution, ewest and most terrible of combatants, is soon to lead e vanward of the army of doubt. We now reach "In lemoriam," the most important poem for our purpose, for it is also the most personal; but on the side of doctrina Christianity one quotation will be enough, because of its comprehensiveness; it is the line in which the poet speaks "Of comfort clasp'd in truth revealed."

This doctrinal recognition of the Bible is unequivocal.

The next lines to be quoted show extremes meeting the "early heaven and happy views" strangely assorting with a faith that "cares not to fix itself to form." It is a well-known passage,

"There lives more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the creeds,"

We are so accustomed to these lines now as to have difficulty in recognizing the years—not further back that 1827—when to ninety nine in every hundred of persons calling themselves Christians, they would have sounded blasphemous. Amid the consternation they caused, Biblictexts would have been brought to bear upon them "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed"—and so forth.

In "In Memoriam" also we find the first expression of what some would call "Higher Pantheism," "Christiau Agnosticism," and much more. But, before leaving the poem it is important to examine the introductory stancas which bear the latest date. The first of these contain the word "believing" almost the only instance of its us by Tennyson after the first period of "obstinate questionings." But, against one use of the creed word in these stances, we have to set "thinks" in the third stance "seemest" in the fourth, "trust" in the sixth, and again

If Within the experience of the present writer, the constant of the year much more recent than is. If it would will be a constant on lines quoted above with mich a laser expection at the constant of the world will be a constant on the constant of the con trust" in the tenth.\(^1\) Nor does the more desimatic term cerr again in "In Memoriam.\(^1\)

It is the same in "Mand,"—a religion liberal, and feomtomise; old and new meet with as little clashing as may be. "We are puppers;" "the drift of the Maker is ark;" "He that made it will garde;" "salien seeming teath may give more life to Love;"

"Arise, my God, and strike, for we hold Thee just";

"But the churchmen fain would kill their church As the churches have killed their Christ."

empson's views of the human and the divine nature of litts; are also variable and comprehensive. A god cample of this tendency to compositive is farmished by the negoing quotation when read side by side with the well-now have of "In Memoriam," "Ring in the Thrist that is be." "Killed their Christ, means "Um, it is the Son fock affects and put is meant their gon they preach an open sharmly reason and their gon they preach an open sharmly reason and their gon they preach an open sharmly reason and the sign they preach an open sharmly reason and the sign they preach an open sharmly reason and the sign that the form In Memoriam" the word "Christ" signs as so man "men and long called the mode of the string, in Christ's king, but its not tall the state sharmly in the same mode of the string of the string the state of the same of the longer heartline king or him in the man who have the worthy even of Christ's second coming:

"Whereof the man that with me trod This planet, was a breathing type." 3

Recommended to the collection of the semiciness of an and and sometimes real; those in the "Morte Action are probably and its asset the early date; · : Monorar "Epilogue, 38.

ss themselves are fully explained in the Appendix to Chap, IX.

a hadrawlers of old saws," in "Sounet to J. M. K."

the similar expressions in "Harold" may perhaps be regarded as mere literary adornment.

Still more noteworthy, proceeding from the lips of Tennyson, are two lines connected with the "Idylls of the King." The first is in the "Dedication" to the Prince Consort, dated 1862,

"Till God's love set Thee at his side again," and the other is the address "To the Queen," dated 1872.

"And fierce or careless looseners of the faith."1

Nothing quite so definite as the first will be found again and the second is evidence that to the last Tennysor clung to or looked kindly on "the old faith."

In the Arthurian poems, again, all the opposing elements appear still interspersed with scriptural allusions; positivism, agnosticism, monotheism, pantheism, doubts concerning God and love, faith in God and love; doubts concerning immortality, belief in immortality; and they will all be found over and over again, together with Bible references, in the poems contemporary with and that followed the "Idylls of the King." One consideration have to be added: the poems towards the close of the conflict speak oftener of trust in God, and Love, and Immortality.

From a survey of his poems, dramatic and personal, i would therefore seem that Tennyson's religious opinion have constantly varied, and could never well be regarded as absolutely definite; as a consequence, his writings are not altogether unlike those other writings, of prophe or evangelist, which may be cited to their purpose by mer of very different shades of belief and thought, from dog matists to philosophers. To these conclusions, which have been drawn from the poet's writings, there may now

&quot;The old faiths loosen and fall, the new years ruin and rend."
SWINBURNE.

e added a very important item of personal testimony. In the "Nineteenth Century" for January, 1893, Mr. Knowles rites concerning Tennyson; "He formulated once and uite deliberately his own religious creed in these words: THERE'S A SOMETHING THAT WATCHES OVER US; NO OUR INDIVIDUALITY ENDURES: THAT'S MY FAITH, NO THAT'S ALL MY FAITH,"

The connection between Religion and Ethics will vary, ut it is nearly always close; <sup>1</sup> even in this age of scientific nalysis it is closer than we imagine. But if for a moment may speak of a poet's ethics as apart from his theology, nen assuredly not one voice in the whole civilized world could question the opinion that the influence of Tennyson's critings in respect of the highest conception of morality wer formed amongst men is not less than that of any other oct.

III.—POLITICAL AND SOCIAL VIEWS. Like his religious pinions, but in a less degree, these were transitional and ending to a compromise. There was in Tennyson a firm ut not exactly dogged clinging to old forms and the ast, and there was some disposition to make "the bounds of freedom wider yet." But change, though necessary and ealthful, was to be "nor swift nor slow." These words re to be found in the poem "Love thou thy land," stated to have been written about the year 1833, but not published ll 1842. And so far off from this as the "Demeter" olume of 1889, almost the same words occur in a poem alled "Politics":

"Up hill 'too-slow' will need the whip, Down hill 'too-quick,' the chain."

n most of his views, therefore, Tennyson was cautious nd temperate,

<sup>1</sup> See p. 37.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;I believe in progress, and I would conserve the hopes of man."-Tenyson, in a letter to Aubrey de Vere.

"Turning to scorn, with lips divine The falsehood of extremes."

He was too cautious, perhaps, ever to be sanguine. Ther were exceptions, however; sometimes a political prejudice or a social conviction would overpower his poetry as when he allowed the roar of the cannon to break is upon the music of "Maud," or when in the two "Locksle Halls" and "The Promise of May" the cries of prophe and preacher rose higher than the chanting of the poet.

Like Shakespeare and Chaucer he had a contempt fo "the crowd," and not always so good humoured an kindly as theirs; for his was an hour

> "When more and more the people throng The chairs and thrones of civil power;" 1

He showed great distrust in the crowd of "ravin Paris," as we read in "The Princess," conclusion,

"Yonder, whiff! there comes a sudden heat;"

And though the poet replies as for himself,

"Maybe wildest dreams

Are but the needful preludes of the truth," yet the protests against the "blind hysterics of the Celt are twice raised in "In Memoriam;" and so late a 1886, in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," we hear h final judgment "Celtic Demos rose a Demon." In the same poem, while convinced that democracy is havin its way, he tells us what that way seems to be—" Democracy in the convince of the convince of the convince of the celts us what that way seems to be—" Democracy is having its own doom."

Of course, like most of the poets of the fifty year behind him, or of those at his side, he has some confidence in the progress and higher destinies of the human race; looks humanly forward to a time "When each sha

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memorian," vxi.; see also exiii These poem appear to have be written in or about the year 184", as they refer to the Charti tonovement home and the various revolutions abroad.

and his own in all men's good:" (though here may be noticed most of all the wavering and occasional back-liding that we have already associated with his religious opinions); and he looks even politically forward to a time when those distinctions, and prejudices, and animosities, and murders hitherto sanctioned by the dreadful, if necessary, name of "National" shall be swept away by numanity in its onward march; or if not quite to this, at least to an epoch of Ethnocracy, as we may call it:

"There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe."

Locksley Hall (65).

But there is little in Tennyson nearer to democracy than this ethnocracy; to him, as to Carlyle, history has been "the biography of great men," and the death of that history is wept over in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After":

"Poor old History passing hence."

Greatness is the measure of the man; those hornhanded breakers of the glebe do not count in the world's records. One still strong man in a blatant land is his best conception of government, present or future. He did not mix with the people in his life, nor with the people did he make his grave. Greatness was the measure of the men who bore his bier. When the poor and the oppressed are mentioned in his pages, it is not with the hopeful sympathy accorded to them in these latter days by many enlightened minds. Enoch Arden, the most heroic soul among all Tennyson's men and women, is one of the English working folk; but Enoch Arden stands almost alone. As we read the poet's writings through, we feel that his interest and sympathy is oftener with the men of many acres. From first to last the rustic squire, for example, is a favourite type; sometimes, as in "Maud," being earthly, he is rebuked, but in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" he appears at his best,1 while the people have sunk to their lowest.2

Like Shakespeare's-perhaps too much like Shakespeare's-was Tennyson's patriotism. It was insular, and was often the patriotism of great men. It was left to our English poet to write a magnificent ode on the death of the Duke of Wellington. It was left to a French poet to breathe as in mournful protest a requiem over the thousands of brave English peasants who died where they had won that soldier's battle. This could hardly have been otherwise; nor does it lessen our debt of gratitude to the bard, who, by his splendid songs to the glory of our country, bids us remember how we came to be and further reminds us how alone under existing conditions we may still stand together if need be against the world, and exclaim, "we are a people yet."

> "This old England . . . Which Nelson left so great,"

Peace hath her victories no less than war, and the splendid ode sung at the opening of the International Exhibition follows immediately on "The Charge of the Light Brigade." Was this juxtaposition of the two poems intentional?

At least it brings home to us the fact that this greatest of poets laureate could silence in due season the long accustomed strains of valour or battle, and hymn the newer praises of national amity and social love.

His views of war may be put briefly. Having referred to the notion that the existence of evil may be traced to worlds before the man, he adds that man "Needs must fight To make true peace his own." Epilogue to Charge of the Heavy Brigade.

This recalls the famous saying, "War is the natural state

<sup>1</sup> Couplets 120 and 134.

man," which is true or false according to the meaning fused into the word natural, the simple truth being at war is the natural state of man in a given state; nen the beast has been worked out, war is the unnatural ate of man. This fact was not altogether lost sight of Tennyson. In "Locksley Hall," before the blight I on him, he looked triumphantly forward to a time nen the war drum should throb no longer.

Later, the time when war shall cease seems to recede rther into the future—

"Far, how far no tongue can say" . . . - Exhibition Ode.

"Will it ever? late or soon?"

Locksley Hall Sixty Years After.

Of commerce he believed perhaps too much at first, d too little afterwards. In "The Princess" "Comerce and Conquest" are "two crowned twins" destined achieve the freedom of the world. In "Maud" the ne is more reserved; in the "Exhibition Ode" his song worthy of the occasion; the progress of the human ce will be advanced by the united industry of the nations, d the merchant ship is to be "the fair white-winged accemaker." From this point, however, commerce is ought less of as a factor in the world's progress. It is no neger coupled with conquest, but in "Locksley Hall xty Years After" the vision of the "Exhibition Ode" seen once more; commerce and peace are now the to crowned twins, and rightly:

"Robed in universal harvest up to either pole she smiles Universal ocean softly washing all her warless Isles."

at again, the vision is seen very far off:

"Warless? when her tens are thousands, and her thousands millions, then-

All her harvest all too narrow-who can fancy warless men?"

Equal in importance to the religious and social moveents of the age, and closely related to each, is the great scientific movement, of inception on the one hand, when practical results are concerned, and of revolution on the other, where it enters the region of philosophic though If science has given us almost a new physical lift scientific inquiry has swept away systems of mental armoral philosophy as old as thinking man. The doctrin of evolution, we might say, has compelled mankind begin mental life over again. From its principles, a from a single vigorous stem, all branches of model knowledge are outspread.

Therefore in such poetry as Tennyson's, which is the very voice of the age, both these amazing products of the age must be represented.

The "fairy tales of science" found a ready listener Tennyson. In "The Two Voices" we read:

> "Before the little ducts began To feed thy bones with lime . . . "

The two stanzas originally at the beginning of "A Drea of Fair Women" are one long figure taken from ballooing, a triumph of science that is introduced yet mo skilfully into "Locksley Hall." Gas is mentioned "The Palace of Art," first edition, and, in the san poem, some omitted stanzas express "the joy wherewithe Soul contemplated the results of astronomical expendent;" and throughout his career, like Shakespeare, the poet makes good poetical material of such contempora marvels; as, for instance, the conjectured planet in the line "To IJ.R.H. Princess Beatrice." The latest example this practice, and perhaps the most interesting of all, who found in the opening lines of "St. Telemachus," whe a graphic description is given of the wonderful sunse that shortened our winter some twelve years ago.

But science was much more to Tennyson than occasion for poetical ornament: he expected from it as much om commerce and conquest;1 he was so enthusiastic it the progress of science seemed slow to him -as slow civilization itself:

<sup>1</sup> Couplets 61-63

Slowly comes a hungry people. . . ."

temporary distrust expressed in the same poem passes ray when he reflects that after all there is more enjoyent "in this march of mind In the steamship and the ilway" than could be found in the islands at the gateays of the day. In " Maud " the distrust grows deeper, "The man of science himself is fonder of glory, and in, An eye well practised in nature, a spirit bounded nd poor;" and by the year 1865 we have had "Science ough and exploring, Matter enough for deploring." he rest of the story is short, and most of it will be told sewhere in this volume. It is a said story of disillusion nd despair:

Fill the sun and moon of our science are both of them turned into blood," ?

nd as will be shown in the chapter on "In Memoriam," ennyson is never more sadly earnest than when he bids nese "days of advance" remember that science "is the econd, not the first."

Evolution he regards throughout with a caution due to ne magnitude of the subject, its numberless yet vast sues. It does not enter his poetry until after the pubcation of "The Vestiges of the Natural History of reation," in 1844. The date of some of the poems in In Memoriam" may be determined by a reference to nis book. There is just a little of teleology in "Locksley Iall," and sometimes the poet identifies teleology with volution. "The Princess" introduces the cosmogony f La Place, the new theory of human development, and the doctrine of design in nature. But "In Memorian devotes whole poems to these and kindred subjects." It sum up, the poet accepts the fact of evolution as regard the individual, and with some equanimity, though It does not attempt to explain the birth of the human sou which is in reality a paramount difficulty when viewe from any such standpoint; and as regards the evolution of mankind as a part, or of the universe as a whole, the bewildered hope of Tennyson is perhaps no less touching than the despair of Lucretius, stern, complacent, amagnificent:

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," xxi. 5; Ixxxx. 7; "Tpilogue" 36; see also "Locksley Jall," 59 and 60-65.
2 From the poem "1865-1866."

"Forward, backward, backward, forward, in the immeasurable sea, Sway'd by vaster ebbs and flows than can be known to you or me."

"Sic igitur mundi naturam totius aetas Mutat, et ex alio terram status excipit alter;"

though Tennyson, as usual, after serving as counsel for the prosecution pleads with equal carnestness for the defence—

"Only that which made us meant us to be mightier by and by";

and thus in some sense he preserves a balance betwee blind optimism and arrogant pessimism.

It was much the same with the great Woman's Right question; the poet is mediator or umpire between contending parties rather than a partisan. This is well seen in one of the characters in "The Princess;" for the King of the North is created to give fuller expression to the Biblical or primal opinions of the "fat-faced curate" in "Edwin Morris;" "God made the woman for the use of man." Yet the "Hard old king," after converting into poetry the well-known Scripture, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," after coming ar to repeating the savagery hinted at in "Locksley dl," "a little dearer than his horse," 1 yet includes hin the same speech sentiments that are the poet's n best convictions; "Man with the head and woman h the heart;" or again, "The bearing and the training a child Is woman's wisdom." The first of these opinions attested by almost all the women in Tennyson's poetry: e second may be found in "In Memoriam."2 From all s we learn that the poet in his zeal as moderator somenes weakens his position as dramatist. And with regard all these important cases-religious, political, social, lustrial, or philosophical, we may say in conclusion that ey have been brought in for hearing time after time ring some sixty years before an intellectual court in ich Tennyson sat as judge. Doubtless the position advocate would have been much more effective for a et; but it would not have been so safe for the nineenth century.

<sup>1</sup> liv., Iv., Ivi., exviii., exx. Some of these prems therefore appear to have been written later than 1844. Soulsoexxiii, and exxiv. Many of then derive material from the Bridgwater Treatises of 1,33-36; others are in debted to Lyell's "Principles of Geology."

&quot;Man to command and woman to obey."

Tennyson erred—if he erred at all—on the side of sedom that grows out of law and bears fruit of order, and if we may embody another figure in a concluding mark, it should be added that during the past fifty years a function of Speaker in our House of Commons has ore than once rivalled the function of the orator; and over was a speaker more needed in the parliament of ought, if these fifty years are, as the poet has described em, years of "Men loud against all forms of power— Unfurnish'd brows, tempestuous tongues— Expecting all things in an hour— Brass mouths and iron lungs."

Freedom.

IV.—MAN, NATURE, ART. (a) Man and Nature.—hese two subjects of poetry are sometimes kept apart,

Take, break her: strongly groom'd and straitly curb'd."

* xl., stanza 4; see also Chapter VII.

but we have the best of both when both are blender Man is made man by virtue of his environment; but, who is not so readily acknowledged, that environment in somsense owes its existence to man.

We need not do more than touch philosophy on the surface, and pass at once to a comprehensive definition of the third term in our heading—Art is man, or nature, to both, idealized.

But the subject of Art must be reserved for the ner division of this section. We have here to consider som of the relations between man and nature as they appear in the poets.

The opening paragraph above may seem trivial, but contains the root of all that is to follow; and possibly may not be usual to consider man as a subject of poetry apart from nature. Yet a brief estimate of the extent t which human existence is reproduced by this poet or tha may not be uninteresting. Shakespeare, of course, stand first; in one of his plays, say Henry V., there is more of our real English life than in any single work of any other writer. In these days of the steamship and the railwayand, we may add, the thousands of novels that sketc every type of character from every grade of life- it is eas enough for a poet to bring all mankind into his pages; s much the more marvellous is the dramatic comprehensive ness of Shakespeare. But after Shakespeare, Tennyso may rank among the best who have left us large legacie of idealized English men and women; he has created delightful modern society to which all are admitted; i which all may find friends who will never fail them; t whom they may withdraw from a world too often coarse or wearying, or unkind; and in whose company they ma multiply and prolong their days.

After this hasty glance towards that better and wonder ful world peopled for us by the poets, we return to the subject of man and nature.

The artificial school of verse-makers 1 whose dealings with the understanding, limit their rhetoric to man; ure, if present at all in their verse, is as parsley primly ced around cold meat-conventional, a matter of urse, and not to be eaten. But in imaginative work Shakespeare's, nature is as the wholesome salad, or refreshing fruit of the feast, to be eaten and to be oved.

n regard to the presentation of the natural world in etry, Shakespeare is easily first. Certainly he never es nature except as related to man; as the background the human picture; but he is so spontaneous, so fresh d so true, that the flowers he has plucked and placed in verse still breathe their early fragrance and glisten h the morning dew. No poet approaches him here.

Burns and Scott and Chaucer and Thompson and atthew Arnold might next be mentioned; Tennyson is t far behind these. He paints our England minutely, autifully, and lovingly, only not so freshly.

"If not so fresh, with love as true;" and for this we ank him deeply. As we turn his pages, the open loveliness English landscapes, the more secret beauties of insect, of, and flower-the countless common glories among nich we tread with hurrying feet-all these he paints; d they are ours only because he has painted them. agland is lovelier, all English life is richer, because has lived amongst us.

Like the other poets named above, Tennyson mostly etches his figures first, and then fills in his canvas with ndscape. But, as already hinted, he loves to limn ature for her own sake too, and sometimes, though rarely, er charms are all his picture. And he can paint all nture; not homely England alone. And, what is more, se Shakespeare and Milton, he can paint what he has ot seen. Shakespeare may surpass him in the power of describing scenery with the mere aid of the imagination and Milton must surpass him in the divine faculty of see ing "things invisible to mortal sight." He could not have the broad strong sweep of brush that has filled some of the pages of "Paradise Lost"

<sup>1</sup> See pp. 8 and o.

"With many a frozen, many a fiery Alp," things fearful and wonderful and vast; he could not have wrought into living beauty

"All that bowery loneliness, The brooks of Eden mazily murmuring;"

for this work of Titan and of Angel was intrusted only to a mortal who was blind; who, compassed about with darkness might espy the secrets of the Abyss, as through the night we other mortals see our heaven beautiful with stars.

But in the Arthurian poems Tennyson has more that rivalled Spenser in depicting a world visionary yet real—more real, more beautiful, and more enduring than the world of living man.

Also he has given us glimpses, vivid and splendid, of "Larger constellations burning, mellow moons and happy skies, Breadths of tropic shade and palms in cluster, knots of paradise. . . . . Summer isles of Eden lying in dark-purple spheres of sea."

The last word brings before us another of his triumphs Shakespeare may always be excepted; but who else like Tennyson has woven verse of the sound and colour and spirit of the sea? Only Swinburne, perhaps, for the sea was his "green-girdled mother."

Then there are the nature-worshippers; poets who break away from their human relationships and share Nature's life; who pant forth her pruses till their voice becomes her voice. Such was Shelley—

"He is made one with Nature; there is heard His voice in all her music;" ch was Shelley when he sang to the west wind:

"Be thou, Spirit fierce, My spirit; be thou me, impetuous one;"

Byron, when he mused by the ocean:

"I love not Man the less, but Nature more From these our interviews, in which I steal From all I may be. . . . ."

Wordsworth, who would "bend in reverence to Nature," o "stood by Nature's side"—

"Nor was this fellowship vouchsafed to me
With stinted kindness...
Mine was it in the fields, both day and night,
And by the waters, all the summer long...."

Prelude.

such, again, was Keats who, to be alone with Nature,

"Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget . . . The weariness, the fever and the fret Here where men sit and hear each other groan."

our day, when scientific thought is again making a god nature, such poets are the more entitled to a share of mpathy and admiration. But none of these was Tennya. Like Shakespeare and Eschylus and Euripides and phocles (dramatists certainly, but they took their bent), e Homer and Virgil and Dante and Milton and aucer, and many other great and serene souls, he was man, and he never forsook his humanity. Possibly he id to the doctrine with which this section opened, "we we the best of both when both are blended."

(b) Tennyson as Artist. If poets such as Browning, inburne, Matthew Arnold, or William Morris were ing considered under this head, we might approach a subject at once; but before speaking of Tennyson an artist in verse, it will be best to take a rapid survey the principles of art. The poet's own views embrace prospect extensive enough for the purpose of this short section, in which, as in the former one, philosophy makere and there be touched on the surface, but never sounded to its depths.

Tennyson's theory of the nature and function of art popular rather than artistic or profound, yet it serve excellently as a starting-point for a whole treatise. It "The Palace of Art," for example, the poet has laid foundations on which both ethical and aesthetic structures make built up in many a modern fashion. Though addressed in the first instance to an artist, the poem was afterwards dedicated to an unprofessional friend; at least the word "artist" was removed. By this change the pomay have thought that he would be making a more generappeal, and one that would reach all men of culture.

For the ethical lesson of "The Palace of Art" is or that should be learnt by every educated man or woma who forgets that

"There's nothing we can call our own but love."

It may be learnt by the poet himself if he remains "orbe in his isolation." We might almost venture to say the Tennyson had built his own little Palace of Art—hedge around with shrubs of laurel. Other poems beside "The Poet's Mind" discover a tendency towards aloo ness; or shall we merely say that he was jealous of hhigh vocation? In "Maud" the man of science was prenounced fonder of glory, and vain; and if we may judg from the spirit of the age, this palace building is quit as common among the devotees of science as amonthe worshippers of art.

In "In Memoriam" a whole poem has been inserte as a warning against the tendency to love knowledge for its own sake; and a place is found in "The Palac of Art," especially in omitted stanzas, for the scientifi

> "You are an artist, and will understand Its many lesser meanings."

chusiast who has broken with the affections and the ponsibilities of our common humanity. But what the sem specially condemns is our modern tendency to me to a merely selfish asthetic account the most solid tues known amongst men; to live above and away me the "darkening droves of swine," those humbler man brethren of the plain; to shut ourselves up in a lace of Art where we may feast in our isolated case on issite dishes made yet more delectable by sweet spices tracted from despised and mutilated memorials of man achievement and goodness. Such an one is the ul in Tennyson's poem; and for her, except repentice be timely, the worm that dieth not is surely waiting, the does repent, however, and is saved.

But, according to Tennyson, it fares worse with another of one-sided human life. Concerning the youth in The Vision of Sin" who built himself a palace of the sh, the poet anxiously inquires, "Is there any hope?" of the answer is given in a language that no man undergode.

There are yet other palace-builders in the volume that ntains "The Vision of Sin'; St. Simeon Stylites, St. gnes, Sir Galahad, build for themselves their palace of stasy; and this is the fairest of all; but

"There's nothing we can call our own but love;"

but Love out," and "in turn shall be Shut out from ove"

In the dedication to "The Palace of Art," from which a last quotation was made, the following passage will found:

"Beauty, Good, and Knowledge are three sisters That doat upon each other, friends to man, Living together under the same roof, And never can be sunder'd without tears. And he that shuts Love out, in turn shall be Shut out from Love . . . ."

Whatever may be its philosophical value—and this w shall endeavour to ascertain—the passage is remarkabl because in 1882, just fifty years after its appearance Matthew Arnold found it worth repeating almost verbatin At the opening of the Josiah Mason Institute at Birming ham, Professor Huxley had declared that science of itse could furnish a liberal education. In an article combatin this opinion, Matthew Arnold contended that science alon was by no means sufficient for the powers and needs complete mental life. "Human nature," he asserted is built up of three powers, a power for Beauty, a power for Conduct, and a power for Knowledge; and they car not be isolated. "I or return to Tennyson's statemen the "Love" of the last line quoted is really included i his "Good" of the first line; and this again is the equivalent of Matthew Arnold's "conduct."

Having suggested this slight modification, we procee to examine the subject of art on the lines laid down b Tennyson.

The use of language endowed us with thought on the one hand, but also, in great measure, with the higher feelings and abstractions on the other. If we now spear of these higher feelings as being either moral, or merel emotional, we have a threefold division of mental life and although the boundaries between these divisions are always debateable, yet the intellectual, the emotional, and

<sup>1</sup> Or, as Tennyson words it in the Dedication to "The Palace of Art, "the perfect shape of man."

<sup>2</sup> It is interesting to matice the same threefold division in "In Memorian (cii.), where the poet represents the maidens of his dream as singing "or what is wise and good and graceful."

<sup>3</sup> Possibly the physical life might have been taken into account, as in i relation to "The Vision of Sin." Life, we might say first, is physical; well as mental; it is better that the soal should subdue the body, than the body should weigh down the soul ("Vision of Sin."), but our physical being demands due recognition in any examination of complete human lift is with the mental life, however, that we are chiefly concerned in the above.

e moral life are sufficiently distinct as a graspable owth of contrast. Next it will be seen that they corspond with the three divisions of Tennyson or Matthew nold; for knowledge is the substance of the intellectual e, beauty of the emotional, and goodness of the moral. orther, science may be regarded as the minister and the pression of knowledge, art as the minister and the exession of beauty, while from one point of view religion ll be recognized as the minister and the expression of a orality that extends through and beyond human exrience into the regions of the infinite and the eternal.

Thus far we have been following the lead of the poet in r endeavour to discover the province of art, and the et's habitation therein; but at this stage we must make short excursion by ourselves.

In the former section, art was defined as "man, or ture, or both, idealized." But the definition was left inmplete, because its completion involved a short inquiry to the history of the human mind.

As a general term for the advance made by man in his ogressive self-adjustment to his surroundings, we may nveniently employ the word truth; truth, then, is the easure of man's success in realizing and harmonizing th the exquisite fitness of things.1

But truth has its special aspects. In one of these it pears as the record of successful attempts made by the

The statement on page 30, "that environment in some sense owes its istence to man," may now receive some explanation. It is possible that m's environment is more indebted to man than man to his environment; cause man's mind not only registers the facts of its environment, but also a potential principle inherent in life and evinced in reaction, it relates and erprets these facts; thus it reveals itself, builds up its own nature, and out its progressive experience creates an ideal of further progression. As to question whether man's environment may be said to exist apart from the elligence that perceives it, we answer that each has called the other into istence, and each for existence depends upon the other. No wonder that nnyson gives a prominent place to "Circumstance" in his poetry. (Sees der poem "Circumstance," p. 95.)

human intelligence to realize and establish harmoniou relations between itself and the external world; and the ideal of this objective or intellectual truth is set forth i Tennyson's well-known poem, "Flower in the crannie wall." In a second aspect it appears as a record of the successful attempts made by the human will to establis similar relations between itself and its actions—or what is ultimately the same thing—society; and the ideal of this subjective or moral truth finds perfect expression i Shakespeare;

"To thine ownself be true, And it must follow, as the night the day, Thou caust not then be false to any man."

Thirdly, when these efforts to realize life to the uttermost are put forth by the emotions, then the harmonic established constitute emotional truth, more commonl known as beauty.<sup>1</sup> Thus, beauty is in the region of feelin what intellectual truth is in the region of cognition, an moral truth in the region of volition.

This, then, is beauty; one product of the many har monious relations established between man and his surroundings by a potentiality of realization implied in corsciousness; and art is nothing more than the attempt to realize more of these harmonies through some emotions medium; and thirdly, to idealize is merely to go beyon

1 Therefore, as in the former note, the sense of beautiful that appreciate and the thing beautiful that is appreciated, have each of them called it other into existence, and each for existence depends upon the other. "Thing beautiful" is the object or the idea that has been placed in harmonion relation to our emotions; beauty therefore in its first aspect is strict relative.

As to the question whether an object may be beautiful in itself, we has postulated for man's intelligence an independent interpreting principle calle into action by the external world; similarly there may exist in this extern world of stimuli something beyond and above stimulus; but of this we have no knowledge. Further, because there is no limit to the harm soies of relative that remain (1) be established between emotion and environment, it follows that absolute beauty is unattainable. The same holds good of intellectuand moral truth.

e's fellows in these progressive attempts to interpret the bjective world of society, and the objective world of sture, history, fact. The ideal of the savage will shock a odern European; the ideal of the modern European in by of these departments of self-expression will doubtless a cause of compassionate astonishment to "the crowngrace." On the other hand, to vitiate any one of these oppoximations to the ideal, is to destroy harmonies ready established under that head.

Although very much remains to be stated, we are now a position to complete our definition of art in the former ection by adding the words, "through an emotional redium." Also we have learnt to regard Tennyson's preefold division of mental life as correspondent to the ree aspects of one great reality—truth. And, finally, a coint of view has been gained from which we may dispover the "many lesser meanings" of "The Palace of curt," and other poems by Tennyson, and more clearly to ecognize the truth of his assertion:

"Beauty, Good, and Knowledge are three sisters . . .

And never can be sunder'd without tears."

With respect to the latter, we have learnt from Shake-peare and from some principles of ethics, that no self-ealization or self-expression can be consistently and progressively self-regarding unless it has reference to the nterests of the whole human family; and since art, science, and morality are modes of self-realization and leff-expression, it follows that each of the three embraces the general progressive good of mankind; and therefore one of them is independent of the others, for none may neglect a power which works equally with itself for the general good. For example, the ideal moralist must avail himself of the kindred powers of knowledge and beauty; in order to be generous he must first be wise. As to the relation between beauty and morality, Tennyson tells tin his poem, "In the Children's Hospital," that flower "freshen and sweeten the wards like the waft of an angel wing;" and in regard to statuary, he points out in "The Princess" that

<sup>1</sup> Beauty, for example.

<sup>2</sup> See note, foot of p. 34.

"To look on noble forms Makes noble thro' the sensuous organism That which is higher."

Similarly, the artist and the thinker must work with the general good in view: they may never "shut Lov out." 1

We notice next in Tennyson's poem that the "soul, the "glorious Devil," loved Knowledge for its beauty and if Good, Good only for its beauty. By this we ar reminded of an expression much in vogue, "Art for art'

We may here briefly consider such "lesser meanings" as the following "Authors, essayist, atheist, novelist, realist, rhymester, play your part, Paint the mortal shame of nature with the living hues of Art."

A little further on (" Locksley Hall Sixty Years After ) we read

"Have we risen from out the heast, then back into the beast again?"

That is to say, if we were right in a builting the progressive nature o morality, and our obligation to it, a return to the past will probably be immoral. In ages dating nearer to man's "coarsest satyr-shape," we migh expect in a poem the fleshly fever of Bacchanalian worship, or in sculpture a Priapus. Unfortunately, in his straining after effect, the artist ofter betrays a tendency towards such retrogression. And this is what the poet implies in the words "Reticence," "Reverence," "naked," "Zolaism," ir the context of the couplet quoted above. As to the "realist," what is true of literary language is true of any other artistic mode of presenting form or fact; it may be striking from excess of ideality or from excess of reality. Chiefly by virtue of contrast, the realist secures his effect of pleasing surprise by a mere copy of the fact, as in "R binson Crusse" -a work that may be contrasted with the ideality of the " Faery Queene." But the realist pointed at by Tennyson secures his effect of surprise, more or less pleasing, by copying facts that are unfamiliar because through the facit consent of a progressive morality they have long been regarded as improper subjects for art. In "Robinson Crusse," for example, a number of the occurrences of our daily life are left unrecorded in deference to the higher purposes of art. Certainly, the modern realist claims only come of this "mortal shame of nature"; to be consistent, he should surely claim it all!

ce;" and we are often given to understand that a conous moral aim is injurious to art.

The real truth is contained in a former paragraph, here art has been considered as a means to an end—be general good, towards which it contributes jointly the science and morality. If in the pursuit of art the nd aims at the higher good, the work of art will be of the highest order as well as of the highest perfection, on the other hand, the artist aims only at artistic effect, will probably fall short of that mark because he did not in above it. This explains the statement, "all really that schools of art have been inspired by religion."

The foregoing considerations seek to establish the ath of Tennyson's doctrine as quoted at the outset; but bey may also explain the many half expressions of his cole truth that are met with in modern literature. The lowing are examples:

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

In conclusion, therefore, the first and the highest aim art is moral; and it was this aspect that was most early perceived by Tennyson. He had an eye and a all for beauty, but he was not an artist "That did love eautyonly;" and to him beauty was "a kind of goodness." Like him in this respect among great poets were Milton d Wordsworth; among lesser poets might be added

This most important truth may be stated in another form. Art, Science, rality, are not antagonistic until one or more of the three makes an empt to dominate another or the others.

&quot;Beauty is truth, truth beauty."-KEATS.

&quot;The seal of truth is beauty."—CHARLES TENNYSON TURNER.

&quot;To see things in their beauty is to see things in their truth."

&quot;Knowledge is the parent of love; wisdom, love itself."- J. HARE.

&quot;True knowledge leads to love."—Wordsworth.

&quot;Utter knowledge is but utter love."-TENNYSON.

&quot;Moral beauty is the basis of all true beauty."-RUSKIN.

&quot;Beauty is a kind of goodness."—HUXLEY.

Cowper and Longfellow; a characteristic utterance of each would be as follows:

Of Milton: - "Poetical powers are the inspired gift God."

Of Wordsworth: -"The purpose of this highly-gifted being is the expression of truth."

Of Cowper:-

"I... tell them truths divine and clear, Which, couched in prose, they will not hear."

Of Longfellow: - "The poet, faithful and far-seeing."

In speaking of Tennyson as an artist, we have chose to deal first and most fully with his characteristic view the subject as set forth in one of his well-known poem. It remains briefly to notice one other aspect of art, ar Tennyson's relation thereto.

To help us in this branch of the subject, we must costruct a more explicit definition of art. "Art is truexpressed, by emotion, in a form of beauty." Milto both in theory and practice, holds a high conception beauty. Wordsworth sometimes stopped at truth.

In Tennyson's well-known poem "The Poet," metaphe and imagery are often confused; but we gather that the poet in his theory attaches more importance to truin poetry than to beauty; yet, as a fact, no artist in ver has laboured harder than Tennyson to attain perfection of beauty. For this he deserves our gratitude. He essential to poetry is this element of beauty may be lear from the lines of Cowper quoted above, or from such a line as this other in which Goldsmith apostrophiz poetry:

"Aid slighted truth with thy persuasive strain."

But this seeking after truest beauty belongs not to poet, nor to poets; rather it is a passion to all artists whare worthy of the name. Much that appearains to the silvect of Tenny mach erary artist will be now the fill of payou re late Laureage support of the authority before is an order in e chapter on the "lay are the line. In the same apter an attempt of the form of the first form. Top et. His dram is possible to a military of the form. IV. His special air a la limit of billed and conphilosophical pastry, nurrities per cycla) in his case at the e renognized in their apur phase in the Of To in, the a lytic presignmently as the condition of the second ovendly to this chapter, and a fille! Apply and the rat may perhaps be related to the rate of his home. un work so estension to tan its to the single that

Tennyson. Wearrows. Making and all for rather A surprise of this facility; where there is a large of the rence to the kindred for day of a tabliful applies are iniet as a play of fant, addressi to the courts heress, humbar is a git, of includence of correct ofthe n pins : and just us maginer in this issituation in A n y, and emonin induces but transpires in land, o : :: includes but transcends wit.

White a project of the one son enter name of isito migra, much fem. to as mo, some to a s nan ny tha e greek na mandrina amin' ny maha di a string or a smultipe ... and it a emption in a and a to the however and a tentor commence of some outsides. e feet them fixtening to be much by Deeding and Homous n the other hand, a for 's a copación or the lort, a roll. o lines compared the members of the property and the co one sanse are large policina de la large de la large. Violence describe la large de la large in its highest form is the "Olli subridens" of a godlil genius who sees through human life, and who therefo flashes a smile even on the tears of its tragedy.

In fact, any resemblance between wit and humour mube traced to the means by which the two forms of se expression are produced: though shading off into or another, yet, broadly speaking, in purpose and effect the arc unlike. In each case we may discover juggling words and of thought; but while this juggling is often the end of wit, it is but the beginning of humour The great humorist, so far as he avails himself the baser instruments, uses them strictly as a mean to a noble purpose, until at last the stage fool is a once the impersonation of the highest morality, if profoundest wisdom, and the most touching pathos for such is the fool of the world's masterpiece. Kin Lear.

The pivot of the subject is the word "play" in a forme paragraph. A genius will almost certainly possess the power to "play," whether in regard to wit or humour, bu he may not always have the inclination. Some joyous sou there are, Shake-peare and Chaucer, for example, wh never lose the godlike faculty of smiling. With others is intermittent. Others again, like Milton, must sup press it almost throughout their life. How was it wit Tennyson? Matthew Arnold seems to speak of him a one who "takes dejectedly His seat upon the intellectual throne." There is some truth in this. "Tears, idle tears may be regarded as the poet's most passionate utterance of a ruling passion. But Tennyson was many minded and he wore his nature lightly enough to laugh in duseason. We must, therefore, expect to find in his writing a proportionate amount of humour.

The best poem for the purpose is "The Princess. There in abundance are wit and humour and all the gradations between. We may begin with the mere verba ibble. "They . . . would call them masterpieces: ev master'd me." This was the highest humour that on the same level. "I thought her half right talking her wrengs." From these low beginnings of wit we w pass to such delicate humour as the following:

> To thrid the musky-circled mazes, wind Bubbled the nightingale and heeded not, At last I hook'd my ankle in a vine, em as IV. 189, 150, and IV. 201-8. As an instance of the et's gift of refined irony, mockery, banter, nothing could rpass "The Spiteful Letter": and of poems essentially morous the finest are "Will Waterproof's Lyrical onologue" and "The Northern Farmer-Old Style." Further it may be noticed that Tennyson's humour in ch poems as "The Princess" and "The Northern unner" is not only delicate and subtle, for it broadens, epens, softens into the beneficent smile of Shakespeare, d Chaucer, and those other demiseds of verse who regard

"With larger, other eyes than ours is perhaps unfortunate that some of the best examples of ennyson's humour are not dramatic, but mono-dramatic,1

Lass fact alone, as will often it in the last since of apters, makes comparison with Shakes care maked the Arter from the error news and a dramatic environment, "The Northern Farmer stands before as and are bound up with the verbal play, as in the poems in dialect. "The Northern Farmer" and the rest are, some of them, wonderfully sympathetic, humorous studies of that ruder life to which a higher civilization looks back every now and then with the fondness and regret of : Cromwell for his sheepfolds; and others again are sketched from a newer world with the same kindly and matchles insight; but dialect is a sort of falsetto, not always reliable as a test of humour; like parody, it produces the mos striking effect with the least expenditure of effort. Man young poets cover their faces with this mask of dialectfrom Shakespeare, let us say, to Rudyard Kipling-the laugh orthey screen their beardless chins behind it. It gav Burns an enormous advantage: "Her 'prentice han' sh tried on man;" this rhyme, and therefore this line (and you will find other instances in the same song), woul have been forbidden to the artificer in literary English Therefore we are not so greatly struck by humour in dialect form; 1 and we may further repeat that it seems to lose i monologue just a little of the perfection to which it attain in drama proper.

VI. As POET LAUREATE. The office of Poet Laureat is often an invidious one, and it has been held in suspicio and scorn by great poets themselves. But Tennyso filled it admirably. As was noticed before, one ca hardly fancy him saying of his perfect life—or of an part of it—O that I might live it over again! What rare fortune was this to fall to the lot of any mortal man and it is true of his poet laureateship; he discharged it perfection. It was pleasant, no doubt, to have a great Queen for patron, and a great era of the people to sing to as a statue that the artist has chippe land chiselled during half a generation Falstaff on the other hand lives and moves amongst us; is of our flesh at blood; and his being is spontaueous as our own. Further, we may not that in his dramas Tennyson's humour is rarely successful.

1 These views are fully explained in the note on "The Northern Farmer all that, it is no easy matter to acquit oneself well in s job-work of poetry. Like the hero in Byron, whose e was not to be commanded, so the poet is coy and ficult to win; when he writes to order we hardly expect find him at his best; and in any case we have misings concerning the verse so produced. Yet Tennyson's ty work is of great excellence, and of itself would form interesting and valuable volume. How graceful and urteous, yet how wise and dignified is the address to the teen which is prefixed to the 900 pages of rare poetic alth which he chooses to call his "poor book of song." combines the advice of a privy councillor with all the spect and none of the flattery of a courtier. And such most of the addresses to royalty. And among the ner themes set apart for the poet who has won the laurel, at excellence again. His patriotic ballads are the est and the noblest of their kind; the "Ode on the eath of the Duke of Wellington" is worthy of "the last eat Englishman." Or, again, what could be more fitting the occasion than the "Ode sung at the Opening of the ternational Exhibition" of 1862; how different the story of the following thirty years might have been if they uld ever have taken to heart the gospel of industry here eached. Whatever the position of Tennyson may be nong the poets of the world, both the Crown and the ople of England give him special thanks and honour the services he has rendered as Poet Laureate.

And what comes next? a slighter age, and no poet?

"A simpler, saner lesson might he learn
Who reads thy gradual process, Holy Spring; . . .
Thy scope of operation, day by day,
Larger and fuller, like the human mind."

Let us not say with one critic that Tennyson is the et of the Laureates, nor with another that 'poetry is eyed out.' Rather let us believe with Matthew Arnold at the future of poetry is immense; that as long as human life retains the common instinct of self-preservation, it will care to reverence and to cherish the higpoetic traditions and powers of its humanity.

Most appropriate here are the words of M. Taine "The poet is for ever young. For us, the vulgar, thing are threadbare. . . . On the other hand, the poet is a the first man on the first day."

The poet is for ever young, but our earth is not for ever; and "Symbols, like all other terrestrial garments wax old." And these wondrous word-symbols of poetry they may outlive a picture, a statue, music; but they to must pass away. Is there no hope beyond this world poetry, the divinest thing human in this world? Let use ask of the great master who has sung of worlds before this world. We ask him not in vain; the answer come as from the region of the immortals:

"If the lips were touch'd with fire from off a pure Pierian altar, Tho' their music here be mortal, need the singer greatly care? Other songs for other worlds' the fire within him would not falter. Let the golden Iliad vanish, Homer here is Homer there."

Our Singer now is there there where we find his worthier to be loved. There let us leave him, deeple thankful that he dwelt so long amongst us, reverent convinced that in benign influences of wisdom, love, and beauty, he dwells amongst us still.

APPENDICES TO CHAPTER I.

APPENDIX I.

(Abridged from "New Studies in Tennyson.")

"This question of occasional weakness in Tennyson's ork gives me an opportunity of introducing the subject Plagiarism, which some reviewers deal with in rather a mmary fashion; and they show but little respect for Mr. nurton Collins; though why writers who, like Mr. Cols, dwell sometimes upon the 'letter that may be falseod' should, of a course, be dead to the 'spirit that ickeneth,' I do not quite see. And here let me repeat, is not that I love Tennyson less, but that I love akespeare and Milton more;' and here let me add. nat I love truth most.' Having the truth, therefore, as motive, I proceed briefly to acquaint you with my pressions of Tennyson as a plagiarist.

"I should first remark that plagiarism is a relative m; that is to say, a small poet is much more liable to charge of poaching in the preserves of literature an is a greater poet. For example, when, in 'In Mepriam,' Tennyson recalled Shakespeare (Hamlet):

'And from his ashes may be made The violet of his native land,' was not careful so much as to change the name of the wer. Our latter-day poet knew his powers and his nsequent rights, and no man need trouble himself to pute them.

"But when at the outset of my studies I discovered that my of the most important additions and improvements later editions of Tennyson's poems might be traced to Shelley, Milton, Wordsworth and others, I was set thinkin for there is some sort of difference between a suggestion from another writer that appears as an organic growt and the same suggestion when it occurs as an interpol tion. My reflections, however, ended by acquitting o poet on the ground of general greatness. But when, the year 1884, I read the Laureate's letter to Mr. Dawson I was again set thinking; and it was not without co siderable effort that I disburdened my mind of its doub You may know the French proverb, 'Qui s'excuse, s'a cuse;' well, it is certainly true of this letter? -written, the poet tells us, 'quite contrary to my custom.' T most notable fact about the letter is that it consists great part of apologies, which appear forced or inco sistent. There is included a very characteristic expositi of plagiarism, and some of the other remarks have uneasy significance and appear to be uncalled for. The who care to read for themselves will probably regret th such a letter should have been written, and they w assuredly be possessed by the conviction that the po remains much greater than his occasional lapses in "Akin to this defect is the tendency common to so other poets to indulge in self-depreciation, to be a lit careful about early poems, to point to their early date, date them indefinitely, and so forth. We have, example, 'The Dead Prophet,' 182, 'the last figure bei omitted, though it is possible that the omission may due to a difficulty in assigning the date; we have the prefatory notice to 'The Lover's Tale,' '19th yes' omissions and amendments that would have been made

USee pp. viloviv in "A Study of Lemyson's Lett.ess. Ty S. E. Daw published by Dowson Brother, Montre d. (Second E.Ltion.)

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;As of plagians m generally; all peets must borrow to some extentimitative, reflective, literary poets most of all. It is not the borrowing, elaborate and searcely plausible excusation that we should complain of."

nisprints of the compositor.' Again, in the note preed to 'The Window,' 'whose almost only merit is rhaps that it can dance to Mr. Sullivan's music.' to the 'Morte d'Arthur' was introduced to us as 'faint omeric echoes, nothing worth.' 'Becket' was 'not innded in its present form to meet the exigencies of our odern theatre.'

"To sum up, I recollect scarcely any reference made by e poet to his poems that does not appear artificial, er-sensitive, or unnecessarily apologetic. I have already sticed the 'genius and geniality' in the 'Tiresias' dedicator. It is surely strange that such an artist should have red to gild refined gold. But, as a last word here, I any tell you that Tennyson when writing prose was like arrick off the stage—'acting.'

"Akin, again, are the poet's lamentations over the disvantages of time and place and race:

'What hope is here for modern rhyme. . . .'

'A tongue-tied poet in the feverous days . . .'

ys of hurry and worry that will not let a singer compose his will like Perhaps the drift of these remarks will be better understood if this obtation is examined more closely as a typical one. In the original edition. Dedication of "The Window" read as follows: "These little songs, one admost sole merit—at least till they are wedded to music—is that they ess excellently printed, I dedicate to the printer." Nothing can be more tking as an example of Tennyson's occasional ostentatious self-depreciation in his carefulness to retain in a totally different context the words here inted in italics.

"Since this Lecture was delivered, I have read Mr. Knowles' Reminis—

"Since this Lecture was delivered, I have read Mr. Knowles' Reminsices, "Aspects of Tennyson, II.," 'Nineteenth Century," January, 1893, re I find careful note of the fact that the respective poems of the three whers may never be identified; that none of the authors had been beyond ir native county; that of twenty-six misprints, the publisher would rect only seven; that the mad scene in 'Maud' was written in twenty nutes, and had been accounted the finest thing of the kind out of Shaketare. Profoundly interesting is the reference to the construction of 'In emoriam.' In the same article the reader will meet with other kindred d significant remarks, especially those on adverse criticism."

'Old Virgil, who would write ten lines, they say, At dawn, and lavish all the golden day To make them wealthier in his readers' eyes.'

"Many similar passages I could quote to you, bu forbear; and we shall all be relieved by remember that our poet is said to have spent a day over a few li of 'Maud;' and let us be deeply thankful that, apart fr these apparent exceptions, his genius was patient a dignified."

APPENDIX II.

(From "New Studies in Tennyson.")

"Even in this department of lyrical poetry, in wh expression ranks comparatively higher, I cannot, like so reviewers, allow Tennyson an absolute supremacy. C tainly Shakespeare and Keats are mentioned as compee and the lyrics of Tennyson (like those of Keats) 'Perfectly beautiful, let it be granted them; where is fault?' But they do not always thrill you; sometime they lack force, fire, passion; sometimes they are swe even to softness, and betray that element of weakn pointed out in a former lecture. Tennyson has writ 'O that 'twere possible,' and 'Early Spring,' but Shel has written the 'West Wind' and the 'Skylark.' Sur Shelley deserved some phrase of mention-we will: speak of honour-from the reviewer's pen. If I mig select one poem in our literature in which all the b elements of lyrical poetry seem to be represented, the poem would be Shelley's 'Ode to the West Wind.' N this is a lyric, and mere perfection of form might give some rank, but notice the many other high qualities t unite to place it amongst the very finest of its kir There is the personal element strongly pronouncedwonderful charm in a lyric you have all felt it in 'Cro ing the Bar;' there is prolonged and fine, mighty a prophetic emotion and thought; there is fiery pass d deepest pathos; there is imagery abundant and lovely d wonderful; and as to the manifold music—listen to e large free movement, now calm for very fulness, now multuous as the tempest; the absolute cestasy of the ng bird; the wild or plaintive or passionate melody; to long cadences of melancholy sweetness—think of ese and all those other elements, just enough reduced perfect form by just enough of perfect art—and then lieve with me that in the poetry of the lyre Tennyson is another rival besides Keats. Shakespeare, as I deavoured to show in my former lecture, should be no all at all 2.

APPENDIX III.

(From "New Studies in Tennyson.")

"Tennyson's chief weakness if I may be allowed the radox—is 'weakness'; even in his charm we often find softness which sometimes suggests want of strength, d is akin to effeminacy. Bulwer Lytton was not altother at fault when he called our poet 'School-Miss fred,' and spoke of him as 'out-babying Wordsworth.' its, for example, is a babyism of Wordsworth's:

'One morning, raw it was, and wet,
A foggy day in winter time. . . . .

d this, though of later date than Bulwer's criticism, y stand for the out-babying by Tennyson :

'I stood on a tower in the wet
And New Year and Old Year met. . . . .'

The following line, I think, occurs in the Arthurian ems:

'What go ye into the wild and so to ee!'

id this in the 'May Queen':

'I thought to pass away before, and yet alive I am. . . . .'

"These lines are quoted partly as examples of general weakness, and not altogether as illustrating weakness i 'charm.' 'What go ye into the wilderness to see?' biblical to excess; metrically weak also.

"Much of the 'Conclusion' of the 'May Queen' below the standard of the other two parts; and this fire line,

'I thought to pass away before, and yet alive I am,'

with its forced inversion and vowel repetition at the clos (especially when we have regard to the rhymes of the fir couplet), is by no means the strongest of its compan. The expression, 'I thought to pass away,' may be dialectic but we are more familiar with 'I thought thy bride-be to have deck'd, sweet maid' (Hamlet). The following examples are chosen from a later poem, 'The Princess Canto V., lines 60-65; also lines 78-102; VI. 131; VI. 21; and some of these again find resemblances in such passage as lines 338-357 in 'The Coming of Arthur. Others will be noticed as we proceed from the fir volume where, in such a poem as 'Adeline,' they are verabundant, to the last volume where, in the dedication 'The Bandit's Death" to Sir Walter Scott, they a slightly apparent.

As to the source of much of this weakness in Tennyso especially as it appears in his first two volumes, we may find it in the earlier work of Keats—the poet to who also he stands indebted for so much of his charm.

"Sometimes this occasional weakness is due to ma nerism, verbal or metrical. An author is said to be guil of mannerism when he employs a striking expression his own, or a known rhetorical device so often as to offer good taste; or when he employs it consciously, and f the purpose of producing a forced and isolated effer rather than unconsciously, and as subserving the ma is further instructive to compare this speech of Bellicent with to "baby-words" of Clymene in the "Hyperion of Keats. But the vislight weakness in this passage of Keats is more than partly intentional.

tistic purpose of his work. One example will illustrate is. The poetical use of the verb harg in such a line as 'I hung with grooms and porters on the bridge,'

Godiva.

n

'Who but hung to hear
The rapt oration flowing free,' curs in 'The Princess' no fewer than nine times, and is frequent recurrence of the word has a tendency to eaken the style both of parts and of the whole.
In Memoriam.

"The reader must not too readily trust the impression oduced on his mind by any isolated passage or example, his word would not have been put forward as suggestive mannerism but for the fact that it is one among a large imber of instances. Only by taking into consideration is nearly as possible the whole of a poet's work can be expect to form a reliable opinion on such points. Parts, says Dr. Johnson, 'are not to be examined till the hole has been surveyed.'"

CHAPTER II.

"POEMS BY TWO BROTHERS,"
"TIMBUCTOO," "THE LOVER'S TALE."

"POEMS BY TWO BROTHERS," 1826-7.

THE title-page of this interesting volume is as follows: "Poems by Two Brothers. 'Heec nos novimus esse nihi -Martial, London; Printed for W. Simpkin and I Marshall, Stationer's-Hall-Court, and J. and J. Jackson Louth, MDCCCXXVII." The contents are 102 short poem covering 228 pages. None of the poems are signed, thoug initials were added in the original manuscript. These again were removed before the book was published. In the reprint of 1893, the poems are signed with the initials A. T C. T., or F. T. (four poems), standing for Alfred, Charle and Frederick Tennyson respectively. Poems quoted i this notice are signed A.T. In the preface to the new editio the reader is informed by the present Lord Tennyson tha the identity of the poems cannot be relied upon, as his uncle Frederick could not be certain of the authorship of every poem, and the handwriting of MS. is known not t be a sure guide. In this edition, moreover, a few poem -not of any importance-have been added; they forme part of the original manuscript of 1827, and are signe A. T.; and they are followed by "Timbuctoo." As t original volume of 1827, we are inclined to wonder it did not contain the "Ode to Memory," which is to have been written "very early in life," and which perior to anything in that volume.

many respects the book bears a striking resemblance yron's "Hours of Idleness." It displays the same sh affectation, self-depreciation, pedantry; there is same or a greater abundance of classical quotations illusions; notes of all kinds, explanations, volunteered mation, apologies. Both books adorn their opening with modest Latin. Byron makes the announcet that his poems were composed by "A minor"o has lately completed his nineteenth year"; some e pieces dated from his fourteenth year. The authors Poems by Two Brothers" tell us that their verses were en "from the ages of fifteen to eighteen" (Charles in his nineteenth year, Alfred in his eighteenth), "not pintly, but individually, which may account for the rence of style and matter." In the "Advertisement" isparagement from which these words are taken, rs the very same figure employed by Byron in his lepreciatory preface; "I have passed the Rubicon," Byron, "and must stand or fall by the 'cast of the " We have passed the Rubicon," the young Tennywrite, "and we leave the rest to fate."

us preface in "Poems by Two Brothers" is succeeded one introductory couplets of similar purport——

"Ye who deign to read, forget t' apply The searching microscope of scrutiny," these again find many parallels in Byron's prose gue. It may be too early to detect in this volume of the sensitiveness to criticism which afterwards me almost a disease to Tennyson, but as in Byron's so in this, some characteristics of the future man be traced back to boyish pages; where also we shall ably discover the first faint signs of genius. They will be very faint, however; the "Hours of Idleness, though not a precocious production, gave greater promis of poetic power, and secured a proportionate share or criticism.

"A good poet's made as well as born." Next to the ir fluence of the "Hours of Idleness," this will probably be the strongest impression felt by an admirer of Tennyson wh reads for the first time "Poems by Two Brothers." That the poet is "born" in Cicero's sense or Ben Jonson's coul scarcely be conjectured from the first collection of the verse of Alfred Tennyson. Such a fact would have to be learn from his later productions. Here we have perhaps the most unpoetical experiments in poetry that were even gathered together in such quantity and proceeding fro authors of such subsequent repute. One of the mo striking features of "Timbuctoo," "The Lover's Tale and the volume of 1830, is the enormous advance in poet power which is displayed by each of them, an advanquite out of proportion to the interval of time that ha clapsed since Tennyson contributed his share to the volume of 1827. Certainly "Timbuctoo" and "Ti Lover's Tale" are blank verse, which may account f something, and there is not any blank verse in "Poer by Two Brothers." In nearly all the pieces the your artists have to contend with rhyme.1

Yet, and this is another interesting feature of the volume we are now considering, an attentive eye and expand discover the prototype or detect the musical germanny a later masterpiece. We have the first of the Lilians and Adelines and Madelines in "Did not the roseate lips outvie;" and it may be as well to me tion here that these portraits of women seem to have be suggested, at least in part, not only by such sketches

<sup>1</sup> To write very good blank very e is, of course, the bighest achievementhiskind; but in blank verse something less than very good, a beginner to often display portio powers that must be suppressed in chymnic, verse.

ron's "Marion," but also by various other writers,

Most important, however, and profoundly interesting, d not to be found in Byron's volume, is the first indication of that minute and emotional description of natural enery, some of it near home, which charms us in "Maina" and "The Dying Swan"—

"Damp and dank

Hang the thick willows on the reedy bank; Beneath, the gurgling eddies slowly creep Blackened by foliage, and the glutting wave That saps eternally the cold grey steep, . . . . "

d in many poems, such as "The Dell of E = -," we get with sketches so famous and familiar in after ges—

"High hills on either side to heaven upsprung, Y-clad with groves of undulating pine, Upon whose heads the hoary vapours hung, And far, far off the heights were seen to shine In clear relief against the sapphire sky." 2

In "Persia" there is preluding of "Timbuctoo," "The esperides," and "The Lotos Eaters." It is in such fragents as these that we may get a first glimpse of Tennym. But what some of us may perhaps look for, we shall of tind, an early indication of the mystic side of Tennym's being; his affinities with other existences and other orlds than ours. In "Memory" there is regret for the "Memory, why deceive me By thy visions blest," at they are not the visions of "Tears, Idle Tears," "The wo Voices," "In Memoriam," "Far, far away," "The ncient Sage," and yet other poems of later years.

There is much evidence, however, of deep seriousness

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," lxxix.
2 "Dying Swan," "(Enone," "Lotos Eaters," and early earnest religion. Indeed the prevailing tone of verse is thoughtful, not with the thoughtfulness of a boy but with the wisdom of manhood or the melancholy of age. But this no doubt is partly due to the influence of Byron; and when the young poets bemoan "the vices of with fond regret, as the case may be, they can point the such lines as the following in the "Hours of Idleness:"

"I loved, but those I loved are gone; Had friends—my early friends are fled. . . . "

"Weary of love, of life, devour'd with spleen, I rest, a perfect Timon, not nineteen."

Byron is the chief inspiration of "Poems by Tw Brothers;" but many other poets lend stray notes; suc are Moore, whom all boys love; and romantic Scott, an Pope, who, strange as it may seem, is often the boy poet; and to these some contemporary versiders may be added. There is also much ransacking of the classics indeed, literary materials are brought from many an strange lands, and the range of reading displayed i "Poems by Two Brothers" is perhaps greater than the which is discovered by the similar but more powerft volume, the "Hours of Idleness," of twenty years before.

"TIMBUCTOO," 1829.

Though not included in Tennyson's collected works "Timbuctoo" will always be associated with the poet name and fame. It is very often regarded as nothin more than a specimen of "prize poetry;" and the dat assigned is 1829. But Tennyson was not the man t write poetry to order within a limited space of time; and when first advised to compete for the Chancellor's needal he is said to have demurred. At the request of his ather, however, he yielded; but he had bethought him of a earlier poem in blank verse, "The Battle of Armaeddon;" this, re-cast, night serve the purpose. One me from "The Lover's Tale"—"A center'd glory-circled temory," and three good ones from the "Ode to temory," lent their aid to the venture. It has already seen noticed that "Persia," in "Poems by Two Brothers," may be regarded as the herald of "Timbuctoo."

<sup>1</sup> See "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington,"

In the "Cambridge Chronicle and Journal" of June 12, 329, the award was made known as follows:

"On Saturday last the Chancellor's gold medal for the est English poem by a resident undergraduate was ljudged to Alfred Tennyson, of Trinity College."

The poem was printed in "Prolusiones Academica" of

The poem was printed in "Prolusiones Academice" of 829, reprinted with Hallam's "Timbuctoo," in 1834, gain reprinted with the change of one word in 1859 a volume of Cambridge prize poems, and it is now cluded in the recent edition of "Poems by Two Broters," 1893.

The subject of Timbuctoo is well set forth in the folwing passage from Hallam's poem:

"Not all youthful joy has past away...

A City stands
Which yet no mortal guest hath ever found.
Thou fairy city . . . I would not wish thee found;
Perchance thou art too pure . . . a splendour in the wild."

Tennyson rebuilds to music the splendid city of a ream. Musing on the past when Atalantis was "A enter'd glory-circled memory" and Eldorado a paradise which "men clung with yearning hope," he exclaims,

"Wide Afric, doth thy sun Lighten, thy hills enfold a city as fair?"

uddenly a seraph stands by his side, and his eyes are opened to behold "within the South" the "crystal pile of Timbuctoo. The scraph then explains his mission, "play about man's heart a thousand ways," and mahim feel and know mysteries of loveliness, things high than he can see; yet, he continues, "The time is wnigh come When I must render up... to keen D covery" this glorious city, my latest throne. That mig well be the poet's mournful conclusion, for, as Shell says, "Those cruel twins, error and truth," have "left nothing to believe in worth The pains of putting ir learned rhyme."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Cones of pyramids" was substituted for "feaks" of pyramids.

Arthur Hallam writing to Mr. Gladstone, Septeml 14, 1829, said of Tennyson's "Timbuctoo," "The splend imaginative power that pervades it will be seen throu all hindrances. I consider Tennyson as promising fair be the greatest poet of our generation, perhaps of century." A remarkable piece of criticism truly, especia for a young man of eighteen.

One of the finest passages in the poem is the brillic simile beginning

"Like dusky worms which house
Beneath unshaken waters, but at once Upon some earth-awakening day of spring
Do pass from gloom to glory, and aloft
Winnow the purple, bearing on both sides
Double display of star-lit wings, which burn
Fan-like and fibred with intensest bloom,
Even so my thoughts, erewhile so low, now felt Unutterable buoyancy and strength
To bear them upward through the trackless fields
Of undefined existence far and free."

Moreover, in the last four lines we have the first expr sion of Tennyson's tendency to a kind of trance involv a loss of personality, which however, seemed "no tinction, but the only true life." Tennyson describes phenomenon to Mr. Knowles in these words: "Sor times, as I sit here alone in this great room, I get carr vay out of sense and body, and rapt into mere exisnce." As we have seen, no reference to this subject uld be found in "Poems by Two Brothers," but it is ire, and in other lines of "Timbuctoo," so early as 1829;
at it is present in nearly all the longer poems to follow, it fullest expression being found in poems exxii. and xev. of In Memoriam." One aspect of this "moving about in orlds not realized" is fully dealt with in the commentary at "Tears, idle Tears."

Milton, Keats, Shelley, and Wordsworth all enter into e composition of "Timbuctoo;" but Shelley is the most aportant vitalizing force; the fertility of imagination, the pid movement of the verse and the splendid imagery e especially his. Still, the poem is due to Tennyson, d besides being excellent work it is the source to nich we trace back the streams of greater excellencies at flow through the "Idylls of the King," "The Prinss," "Lucretius," and most of the other works in blank rse. This Tennysonian close, for example, unless a tle too imaginative, will suggest Dora:

"And the moon Had fallen from the night, and all was dark:"

ere is a cadence that will be heard in "Lucretius,"

"And thick night Came down upon my eyelids, and I fell."

nd this Miltonic trick of verse is often overdone by ennyson:

"As when in some great city where the walls Shake, and the streets with ghastly, faces thronged. . . ."

The word "shake," owing to the pause immediately dowing, takes to itself about half the collective weight accent in the whole line. Then, as might be inferred om the rapid movement of the verse indicated above, the lines often run without a break into one anoth until with the aid of the pause a medial line structure effected within the terminal, and becomes a domina measure of greater complexity and greater beauty.1 It the manner of young poets under less enlightened co ditions to measure line and thought or limb of thous with the same instrument of measurement, and thus i consciously they avoid much of the trouble of blank ve making. But then, of course, the lines they turn out are: or most of them, end-stopt and monotonous, like many the early lines of Shakespeare. Not in this respect on but in a multitude of others, Tennyson (and this is true Browning and Swinburne, and Matthew Arnold and m other modern poets) seems to have overleapt the perof mere experiment or tentative practice in blank vers and these remarks apply equally to another long poem the same metre, "The Lover's Tale," which was writ about this time.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Nineteenth Century," January, 1893. 2 Chapter VII., Appendix.

"THE LOVER'S TALE," 1827-8.

This poem, written, as Tennyson tells us, in nineteenth year, i.e., between August 6th, 1827, a August 6th, 1828, and, therefore, before the poet w to Cambridge, was not given to the public until 18 when it appeared, with "The Golden Supper" as P IV., in a volume of ninety-five pages. Originally had been printed as the last poem in the volume

<sup>1</sup> Other characteristics of the verse are an abundance of slurred syllab these also quicken the movement, and there are "feminine endings," we add to its variety. This subject is treated more fully in the first Apper to Chapter III. The "did" tense (Chapter III., Appendix ii., p. oc urs frequently; the word "rapt" is used twice, so is our fan "distinct." Many phrases appear, which are employed afterwards, suc the "wild unrest" of "In Memoriam."

33, but was withdrawn, perhaps, as being too long for a volume, or more probably, because its author was ghtened by recent adverse criticism, and regarded the em as imperfect. Nevertheless, a title-page being ded, it was published as a small volume of sixty pages, t was immediately suppressed. Of the few copies that d been presented to friends all were recalled except e, now preserved in the Rowfant Library. It was from a copy that the poem was pirated about the year 1868, d in consequence Tennyson determined to include it h a brief third part, and the Sequel, in "The Holy ail" volume of 1869. But again the poem was withtern, only the Sequel being printed. This is known as the Golden Supper."

f "The Lover's Tale" in its present form was written ore Tennyson entered Trinity College, and within a ar of the 1826-7 volume, it is a most remarkable work, ecially when we understand that the author contemted omissions and amendments, and that it was marred the many misprints of the compositor (see Prefatory e). It is more remarkable than "Timbuctoo" of 1829, re remarkable than most of the contents of the 1830 or 3 volumes as originally published, and only less remarke than Browning's first poem. By a curious coincidence owning's "Pauline" was published in 1833, the year in ich "The Lover's Tale" was printed. And if we admit, at is only reasonable, that Tennyson's poem was under ision up to the time of its appearance in print, we shall able to compare between the two young poets, who for re than half a century were to be rivals in such a rich own. Browning was twenty-one on May 7th, 1833, and anyson was twenty-four on August 6th of the same year. ewed in the light of these dates, "Pauline" has a still ater advantage over "The Lover's Tale;" for, as we ture to think, when viewed in any other light it appears be a greater poem, and a poem of more certain promise.

Another striking coincidence between the two poems the influence of Shelley in each. Line for line, there not in all literature a wealthier storehouse of image imagination, and passion than Shelley's "Epipsychidio From this especially, but also from his writings general both poets have derived much inspiration and municipal

The characteristics of "The Lover's Tale" will revelence to all who read it together with its sequel, "Togoden Supper," which appeared as an independent poin "The Holy Grail" volume of 1869. Parts I. to III. who form the early poem have a certain charm in the vexuberance, freshness, and swiftness of youth; someting an overwrought fancy as of the later Elizabethans cheef the impetuous imagination of Shelley; or again the stree of story is lost amid a wild luxuriance of imagery "Of eglantines, a place of burial Far lovelier than its cradle."

The rush of the verse seems to save the poet from so of the weaknesses that appear in most of his early wo but such a figure as the following:

"Cries of the partridge like a rusty key Turned in a lock," would have been excluded from his well-considered ea work. In "The Golden Supper" all faults disappe we may miss some of the freshness of youth, but enjoy the excellence of art.

CHAPTER III.

"POEMS, CHIEFLY LYRICAL, 1830; OR, JUVENILIA."

"TO THE QUEEN."

ESE dedicatory stanzas were first published in 1851, year in which Tennyson was presented as poet reate at the Queen's levee in Buckingham Palace. ey were then one more in number, for the following somitted in subsequent editions:

"She brought a vast design to pass
When Europe and the scatter'd ends
Of our fierce world did meet as friends
And brethren, in her halls of glass."

e stanza has defects, the expletive "did meet," for ample. In other respects it is below the standard of rest. And if we may trust the impressions of Carlyle, exhibition of 1851 was not notable enough to be gled out from the events of the reign. Of the exhibit of 1862 Tennyson wrote later, "The world-compelgation was thine," and this time the credit of the vast dign is transferred to the Prince Consort. Almost ry line of the original dedication has been altered; first two words, "Revered Victoria," fully attest the enormous value of even the slightest changes made. Tennyson in the indefatigable industry of his genius.

One other emendation may be noticed:

"And if your greatness and the care
That yokes with splendour yield you time
To seek in this, your Laureate's rhyme,
For aught of good that can be there."

This earlier reading of the third stanza points to a till when the poet wore the wreath uneasily. And in the original MS, it was preceded by another from which receive the same impression:

"Nor should I dare to flatter state, Nor such a lay would you receive Were I to shape it, who believe Your nature true as you are great."

In 1889 this MS, was sold for £30. It contained well-known footnote addressed to the publisher (Moxe part of which ran as follows:—"Ought not all the yeard the yours and the hers to be in capitals?" To poem in its present perfection, a reference will be for on p. 47.

"POEMS, CHIEFLY LYRICAL, 1830; OR, JUVENILL

In 1830 Tennyson came before the public with "Poe Chiefly Lyrical," a small volume of 154 pages, and containing 53 short poems. This was succeeded in 1833 by anot volume of about the same size, containing 30 poemostly short ones.

Every educated Englishman is familiar with the nation of most of the poems that appeared in these first volument unless he happens to possess the books as origin published, he will form a very false estimate of Tennys relier poetic achievements. Taking the two volumes gether, it will probably be no exaggeration to say that eir value as compared with the value of the poems that represent them in recent editions is not more than one rind. For the presence, in the two early books, of poems afterwards rejected, lowers their value by about no of the thirds, and the other third of deducted value accounted for by readings since corrected. This fact would be borne carefully in mind by every student of ennyson, namely, that the two groups of poems in odern copies headed "Juvenilia" and "The Lady of halott and other Poems," are far from being representative of the poet's handiwork at the periods to which they is spectively refer.

Further, the volume of 1842, in which many of the leces comprised within the two groups just mentioned opeared in a revised form, contains a notice concerning he four poems "You ask me why," "Of old sat Freedom," Love thou thy land," and "The Goose;" this notice is to the effect that these added pieces were written, with the exception, in 1833; but again we must remember that as they did not appear in print until 1842, they also deceived the benefit of the poet's maturer pains.

Since, therefore, these two groups are corrected up to 842, and yet the one group is still called "Juvenilia," and since both groups are practically regarded as representing the volumes of 1830 and 1833 respectively, we seem to have before us a double task; the first to treat the "Juvenilia" and "The Lady of Shalott" poems as they originally appeared; the second to deal with the in their improved forms as poems published not earli than 1842. Or perhaps it may be possible to adopt to middle course of examining each version of a poem as we review the groups scriation, taking also a passing glan at the rejected poems.

<sup>1</sup> A poet's genius at any given time is measured almost as much by what e rejects as by what he retains.

<sup>2</sup> A title adopted by Byron for one of his early poetic ventures. It may so be noticed that the "Juvenilia" contains poems that did not appear in see volume of 1830, and in "The Lady of Shalott" group are some poems at published till 1842.

<sup>3</sup> These remarks apply also to "The Two Voices," which, although first

The equity of some such course will appear from ma considerations. For example, in editions of twenty yea back, we find "The Lady of Shalott" poems in the amended form described as "Poems published in 183: That description is now wisely omitted; then why shot not the title "Juvenilia" be omitted also? Further, to other title, "The Lady of Shalott and other poems," is little misleading, for it has a tendency to carry the reach back to 1833.

This chapter would therefore be headed more exac "The Poems of 1830, together with such of these poet as were published in an improved form in 1842."

Why the title of the volume published in 1830 show have been "Poems, chiefly Lyrical" does not appe from its contents; for strictly speaking, all are lyric more or less. Possibly the poet had in his mind t early volume of Wordsworth and Coloridge, the ce brated "Lyrical Ballads" of 1798, especially when remember that Arthur Hallam was to have been jo contributor with Tennyson. Or the poet may have tended to imply that "The Lover's Tale" and ma other long pieces were in hand, or some of these w originally to have been inserted, such as the "I published Drama written very early," a chorus from wh is included in the volume. Or again, we may interp the title by citing Tennyson's remark to Mr. Knowles, soon found that if I meant to make any mark at all must be by shortness, for all the men before me had be so diffuse, and all the big things had been dor "Timbuctoo," a fairly long poem, had been forced, as ay say, into print; and "The Lover's Tale," though stually included at the end of the volume of 1833, was ithdrawn before the book was published. Such, apparently, was the poet's determination to publish only short peens, and "to get the workmanship as perfect as possible."

And for so young a man, the workmanship of this and he succeeding volume is very fine indeed. It would not be easy to name a poet who wrote better verse at such an arly age. The well-known remark of Coleridge in 1833, He has begun to write verses without very well undertanding what metre is "admits of only a partial explanation. Coleridge tells us that he "had not read all the opens;" nor did Tennyson accept the elder poet's advice to write for the next two or three years in none but one try two well-known and strictly-defined metres." Possibly, is will be seen further on, some explanation will be found in the fact that the young poet often refused to write in metre at all.

On the other hand, if Coleridge had complained that Tennyson's early poetry was fair enough in form but wanting in spirit; if he had noticed the weakness of poetic impulse as compared with experimental word painting and wealth of amassed material, and that many of the experiments were of a puerile, or trifling, or effeminate, or dilettante kind; if he had noticed further that the relation between form and thought was inorganic, like that of clothes to body, not organic like that of body to soul—had he quoted a line from "Three Sonnets to a Coquette,"

"The form, the form alone is eloquent," we might have understood him better; for many poets of the same age have been more poetical, have put more spirit into the form of their poetry; there is too much far too much—of the cunning phrase-maker, and too litt of the singer in the first volume.

Remark to Mr. Knowles; "Nineteenth Century, January, 8.

How different it might be, will appear from these lin of Byron:

"As on the beach the waves at last are broke, Thus to their extreme verge the passions brought Dash into Poetry, which is but passion, Or at least was so ere it grew a fashion."

Most of the poetry in this, and much in the succeeding volume, is "a fashion." That is the gravest fault we confind with it. But this fault is not without a redeeming charm; and how often have we wished that the ear passionate utterance of Shakespeare, Byron, Shelle might have clothed its strength with more beauty.

The following, in the order of their importance, a some of the special features presented by the fifty-thr poems of the volume of 1830.

(a.) The extraordinary inequality of the pie.es, some which are weaker than any in "Poems by Two Brother while a few display a striking originality and a poetic facu and charm considerably in advance of "Timbuctoo" a "The Lover's Tale." Inequalities in the same poem, e. "The Ode to Memory," will also be noticed.

(b.) Two poems will be remembered as most fully presenting this new charm so suddenly and unexpected introduced into poetic art—"Mariana" and "The Dyi Swan." Of each of these the germs may be found in t quotations from "Poems by Two Brothers" on p. The lines in "Mariana," may be compared with the first quotation, "Damp a dank," etc., and with the second, "High hills on eith side," etc., the following lines from "The Dying Swan"

"A sluice with blacken'd waters slept, And o'er it many, round and small The cluster'd marish-mosses crept, . . ."

"Some blue peaks in the distance rose, And white against the cold-white sky, Shone out their crowning snows. . . ."

These two poems are the most original and the most ghtful pieces in the volume. Next to them "Oriana' the be mentioned as possessing a little of their charm, next to "Oriana," "Claribel."

Laving looked into the poems to discover the source of charm, we seem to find it in a new, often minute, and ays emotional description of nature; the emotion being partly by the earnest poet, partly by some individual mate object, generally a human being, which is placed a pathetic situation and made to impress its pathos all its surroundings; whether the scene is sketched t, or the individual, the result is the same; nature is expused with the animate emotion. This will be more by explained in the separate notice of each poem. In laribel," for example, the emotion expressed in the first impregnates the whole. We may recognize the same ct in the first line of Gray's Elegy.

c.) This is the pictorial element, chiefly. But along with and as part of it, we hear a new music of verse, made a blending of all past beauty of sound in song, and like other element taking witchery from the human otion. The impression of originality which we receive in these two elements in Tennyson is due first, of tree, to the poet himself, in his earnest relation to his rk, as explained in the note on "Claribel," but also to eful workmanship and a close attention to the best dels and materials of former artists. In his most ective work, gems of former poets, sometimes re-cut or polished, will almost certainly be found set cunningly ongst his own. It may be added that among Tenny's forerunners, the poet who has most nearly succeeded in producing this kind of poetry is Coleridge; after him Keats may be mentioned.

There is yet another new music of poetry in this volume chiefly in blank verse, the main feature of which is it arrangement, body of sound, and movement; it may bleard in the three lines quoted from "The Dying Swan," or in blank verse in the opening lines of "The Sea Fairies," and in such lines as the following in "The Mystic":

"Four faced to four corners of the sky.... For the two first were not, but only seemed One shadow in the midst of a great light."

The last line is the ancestor of many hundreds in poen to come: 2

"And the new sun rose bringing the new year."3

This new verse is often weighty with finely modulate vowel sound, the nearest thing to it in earlier literatu being the "Hyperion" of Keats.

(d.) The number of poems irregular in metre, or having no metre at all; formless poems, such as most of the sketches of women -in fact, a large proportion of the pieces in the volume.

These formless poems are most of them novel, and the are not often imitated in after years. There are but throof four even in the volume that follows so closely on the and there are none in the volume of 1842. They are reformless, however, quite in the sense in which most of the writings of Macpherson, Tupper, and Whitman are formless. They possess such symmetrical elements as felines, and usually rhymes. But while one type of foot mostly preserved throughout, the sequence of the rhymand the length and the sequence of the lines are not ducible to rule.

<sup>1</sup> P. 73.

<sup>2</sup> The chief peculiarity is in the last two feet; they are, first Pyrr second Spondaic.

<sup>3</sup> Last line in the "Idylls of the King."

This increase of variety often threatens not to adorn to destroy the element of uniformity; and we are usible that the poet is securing for himself an unfair vantage. (See the first Appendix to this Chapter.)

(e.) Influence of the poetic past: - Minor contemporary ets are not so frequently present in this new verse. Of e past, Byron has ceased to be a potent influence; elley is less a power over the poet than he was in Timbuctoo" and "The Lover's Tale," but he is well presented, especially by material from "The Witch of las." Keats appears; and he will be more clearly recogable in the next two volumes. Milton, Wordsworth, pleridge and Shakespeare are met with here and there: t to complete the list of poets, Latin and Greek as well, nose echoes blend delightfully with this new music, buld be impossible. And Tennyson drinks of other iters than those that flow from the familiar Hippocrene: take one example from the beginning of the volume : e epithet "crimson-threaded" attached to "lips" in Lilian" may be derived from "The Song of Solomon," 3, "Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet."

3, "Thy this are like at thread of scattlet."
(f.) Next to this careful hoarding and use of the literary easures of the past -and it will be still more noticeable subsequent volumes -we may mention the storing up poetic materials, studious nature-painting, word-inting, phrase-making, elaboration of poetic diction all kinds.\(^1\) No poet ever amassed and prepared his aterials so extensively, carefully, and systematically as ennyson.\(^2\) It should surely be the despair of all who come after. Also there is abundant experiment in m and numberless other poetical devices; the most strik attempt being the many formless poems of which n tion is made on p. 74. Apart from this, thought is o exquisitely adjusted to form, mood to imagery and muthe natural world to its human habitants.

Compound adjectives, poetic detail often repeated, excesses, as of old al (probably caught from Keats), pet words, pethaps archaic—"light and adow," "marish," and the like.

And no poet exhibits the fact so patently. Perhaps one illustration setted from a large number may serve to make this clear. The word region, of doubtful grave, but employ 1 by sponsor and C lendge, was dissed (p. 170) from "The Millers Daughter of 1 33, and reappeared Dalin and Balan" of 1885.

- (g.) The Effect of the Impulses of the Day, and of a surroundings, especially Cambridge life, on the polabits of thought. This is illustrated by such poems "The Mystic," "A Sonnet," "The Supposed Confession a Second-rate Sensitive Mind," "To——" "The How the Why," and by one or two patriotic poems; for exam "The English War-Song," and the "National Song."
- (h.) A Tendency to draw Characters or Humo, and sometimes to endue them with a portion of his oindividuality.
- (i.) Restricted Views of Art. See especially "The Po
   (j.) A Subtler Use of the Classics. This is touc upon in (e).

The above list of special features of the volume which inaugurates Tennyson's remarkable career does not air being exhaustive. Many other poems might have be selected as giving some evidence of a new power or bear in poetry, such as "The Ode to Memory," "Recollection of the Arabian Nights," "The Sea-Fairies," "The Po" "The Sleeping Beauty": and the sometimes labour often musical, but always artificial sketches of women for a novel and pleasing group. Further, we are left wit general impression of fine imagination allied to sobriety thought, of sympathy with nature, a marvellous power of picting and idealizing natural objects, a refined devotion truth as well as to beauty, and a musical inventiveness a charm that subdues all those other elements unto itself.

The poems will now be considered seriatim. As plained in the Preface, the numbers in brackets give page of the one-volume edition.

(2) "CLARIBEL" by its title illustrates Tennyson's prepence for fine-sounding literary names that contain some mote allusion. Thus he adds to the beauty of his work. iten the poem or scene comes first, and the name cond, as in the case of "Fatima." "Claribel" has been ade poetical by Spenser ("Faerie Queene," II. iv.) and takespeare ("Tempest"), though we need not always lek to identify Tennyson's name titles.

In this poem we find a curious compound word "lowth"; also it is interesting to note that the following ngle words in the original edition, "roseleaves," "oakee," "thickleaved," "clearvoiced," are now written as mpounds; this means that the artist is anxious to adopt ery possible device whereby a given number of words all produce the most striking effect. Here also are vourite words and expressions; "ambrosial," "thickaved," "inward," "athwart," "slumbrous," "runnels," hollow." 1 The "lintwhite" and some of the former ords occur in poems suppressed—portions of the second Mariana" may be instanced. Some, such as "inward" "inner," are very frequently used; "with an inner pice," for example, in "The Dying Swan." As implied some of our former remarks, a whole volume might be ritten on Tennyson's collecting, hoarding, and economizg of words, phrases, and images from nature; there is othing quite like it in the history of any other poet.

We may now add that to point to this fact is not to ispraise Tennyson; in such careful study of poetical naterial of all kinds we have already discovered not a little f the magical beauty of his compositions; but at present e has not become expert enough to disguise devices or to conceal effort. In "Claribel," for example, the fanciful compound "low-lieth" spoils the effect o other words with a similar archaic ending.

<sup>1</sup> From other poems the list may be increased by "marish," "mellow," round," "circumstance," "use," "level," "counterchange," "poplar," and any more. "Broad-based" in the "Address to the Queen" and the Arabian Nights," is "the broad-based pyramids" of "Poems by Two rothers;" then it appears in "Pyramids broad-based" of "The Gem" of $31. In "The Supposed Confessions" it is varied to "broad-imbased."

This poem, which is placed first in the volume, many respects a typical production, and therefore receive a proportionate share of our attention.

Tennyson calls "Claribel" "A Melody." What the means by the term may be guessed rather than discove Probably he would wish us to reverse the well-kr expression "Songs without Words" - music, that is to which is almost articulate, and style his poem "w musically inarticulate," or word-music. Whatever i lectual basis the melody may possess, will be seen in following paragraph. But first we may notice the element eve, noon, midnight with which we are familiar in the two "Marianas" and kindred poems; remember also the constructive principle already gested of rise, culmination, and decline. Finally, we characterize "Claribel" as a beautiful requiem of na over humanity, borne in upon us by

"Some gradual solitary gust
That comes upon the silence, and dies off,
As if the ebbing air had but one wave." 1

The poem has already been referred to in the Introtion to the volume of 1830, under the heads of emotidescription of nature and emotional music, which bl in one new and delightful effect of charm. Sometimes <sup>1</sup> Nature is seldom used in this way by Tennyson. It is so in the nade in "Mand," but that suits the excited lover; is appropriate also t lover in "The Talking Oak," (t. dso "The En ok," and the human pathies of the sea in "Freeh Angle," and "Sea Dreams," The sent of "Clarbel may also be cauped with the to lowing stanza omitted Gray's Elegy:

&quot;There, scatter'd oft, the earliest of the year, By hands unseen are show'rs of violets found; The redbreast loves to build and warble there, And little footsteps lightly print the ground."

y discover the secret of Tennyson's charm by observthe process of building or reconstruction, as in the alace of Art;"1 sometimes, but only in part, by reving the musical and pictorial elements, and comparthe residuum with the original. Treated thus "Clael" would be reduced to some such prose as the owing: - "Caroline is buried near an oak tree, a ve, a river, a smaller stream, and something like a e. The spot is marked by a stone overgrown with ss." Or the bare fact might be stated in four words, he girl is buried." If we now reverse the process and ct on this low foundation the whole fabric of music l vision, we shall find the practice delightful and inactive. If next we seek to establish within our minds subtle relations existing first between the spirit and the m of the work, and secondly between the architect and building as of creator to his creation, we shall proolv expect to grasp the charm itself. But there we ould stop; for to grasp the charm, could we ever do it, uld be to destroy the charm; it would be like taking heart out of a nightingale to get at the secret and source of song.

Hence the words "in part" which are employed above, is exercise nevertheless, both analytical and syntheal, is useful and even necessary to the student and clover of poetry; and it is the same with all the er arts.

2) "NOTHING WILL DIE." 3 "ALL THINGS WILL E." Many poets have set themselves to balance the sand cons of life; and according to the later Tennyson, a second scale is oftener the lowest; yet, latest of all, holds them even. There is something like this in lton's "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" the order of the poems in each case being the same, and seemin discover a tendency toward the graver aspects of existence. In Shakespeare the corresponding pieces "Henry V." and "Hamlet." By-and-by in Tennyson opposing forces meet in one poem,—"The Two Voic or "In Memoriam," or "The Ancient Sage." Bes other poets, Shelley and Barry Cornwall may be recogn in "Nothing will Die," and Wordsworth in "All this will Die."

<sup>1</sup> This study, especially of emendations, is very important.

- (3) "LEONINE 1 ELEGIACS." This exercise beconnected when compared with the experiments quantity on p. 243 2 ("Hexameters and Pentameter Making due allowance for the rhymes, these elegiacs the "longs and shorts" of a schoolboy who scar knows how ill they look in their foreign dress; and later "Experiments" prove that the writer felt how ceedingly difficult it was to force the classic metre English, but prove also that if it could be done, he could be done, the country of the country of the country of the same than the same that it is poem has other aftites with the first "Mariana," as will be mentioned later than the same tha
- (3) "SUPPOSED CONFESSIONS OF A SECOND-R. SENSITIVE MIND." Hallam complains that the title "an appearance of quaintness, which has no suffic reason, and seems incorrect." "The mood," he contin "is rather the clouded season of a strong mind than habitual condition of one feeble and 'second-rate.'" justice of this remark has been noticed elsewhere (p. We here see something of the poet himself in the stage of the religious uncertainty described in "In moriam" by the words "Perplext in Faith" (xcvi).

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Leo or Leoninus, canon of the Church of St. Victor, Paris, tw century, who wrote many such. The end of the line rhymes with the mi <sup>2</sup> Complete Works, one vol.

"It is man's privilege to doubt,
If so be that from doubt at length Truth may stand forth unmoved of change. . . ."

"Ay me! I fear All may not doubt, but everywhere Some must clasp Idols."

The poem comes of contact with university life and bught, and gives evidence that Tennyson was beginning share in the new ideas about religion. These ideas ok the form either of destructive criticism, or of a new instructive, earnest, and practical Christianity. Tennymadopts something of both.

At present we have glanced at five poems only; but ese are knough to show us what will appear more ainly as we proceed, that much of the poetic material apployed bears the stamp either of Tennyson or of some ner poet; that is to say, reading almost any half dozen nescutive lines, we are able to say this is Tennyn's work, or, this is a modification of some other poet's ork.

One or two passages in the "Supposed Confessions" e noteworthy. The sketch of infancy is remarkable iefly because it gives no hint of antenatal existence. teresting, on the other hand, is the appearance thus rly of the following figure:

"As from the storm Of running fires and fluid range Of lawless airs, at last stood out This excellence and solid form Of constant beauty."

he lines descriptive of the dying lamb have a wonderful lness of detail. In sentiment they are something akin the following from Pope's "Essay on Man," Epistle i. 1-86:

"The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day, Had he thy reason, would he skip and play? Pleas'd to the last, he crops the flow'ry food, And licks the hand just rais'd to shed his blood. O blindness to the future! kindly giv'n, That each may fill the circle mark'd by heav'n."

Being of a considerable length, the poem pre many peculiarities of imagery and diction, one or to which may be mentioned. "An image with profu brows" appears in "A Fragment" as "A perfect with profulgent brows." There also will be found slumbrous summer noon" of the eleventh line, but in Fragment" summernoon is printed as one word. Te son's characteristic use of the verb "draw" occurs in the poem; twice also the word "hollow," which is haps his special favourite at this early period, and in for a long time to come: it appears in "hollow air;" "hollows of the fringed hills." The constantly recu "inward" of "Claribel" and "Mariana" is here "Hating to" and "proof" are used again in the Se to J. M. K. Other examples will be referred to in sequent notes, but a considerable proportion will b unnoticed. This is true in most other instances; cometimes, as in the case of the former poem, and ev such characteristic compositions as "Recollections of Arabian Nights" and "Eleanore," the limited space present volume precludes the introduction of a su

(6) "THE KRAKEN." The monster is either serpent or octopus. "Faintest sunlights flee Aboushadowy sides"... recurs in "Lucretius" as "the sun delights To glance and shift about her slisides..." The poem is a kind of sonnet of fifteen with the climax at the tenth instead of the eightle contains some skilful lines, and some that rese Shelley, "The dull weed some huge sea-worm be on."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Prometheus Unbound."

(6) "Song." Here the "crisp waves" and the "ridges" f "The Supposed Confessions" re-appear as the "crisped ea" and the "ridged sea." The latter—the "enridged ea" of "King Lear," IV. vi. 71—occurs in "The Sea airies;" and it may be compared with the "ridged wolds" f the "Ode to Memory;" while the former becomes he "crisped Nile" of "A Fragment," and after frequent imployment in poems published and unpublished may be seen as "the crisping white" in "The Holy Grail." Mellow" may be noticed; also the compounds "downarolling," "low-tinkled."

(6) "LILIAN." Begins and ends with "fairy Lilian;" ses like a fountain from a small jet of water, towers retty and musical for a moment, then falls back into the t. Here again is "pleasance;" and the compound ords in proportion to the length of the piece are very umerous-ridiculously numerous. It is astonishing that ich a cunning artist should betray a lack of taste like is. The piece is also rather weak. Certainly the comounds suit the light sketch; but "innocent-arch" and cunning-simple" and some others are effeminate. Comounds are perhaps the most effective of all epithets; ney really compress a clause into a word. All good oets use them; young or inferior poets sometimes abuse nem; at present they are so treated by Tennyson; but ney never were by Milton; they were by Rossetti, who eaks of "soul-winnowing hands," and a "soul-sequesered face." Shakespeare is first under this head of comound epithets; his are so fresh, forcible, appropriate, eautiful. In Shelley they are often splendid; in Keats ney sometimes resemble Tennyson's, as in "purpleained mouth;" but Keats had a way of his own of rengthening and beautifying epithets, small or common nes, monosyllables-

&quot;Where palsy shakes a few sad last gray hairs."

"And uninding mossy ways

" In faery lands forlorn."

If all the examples are from the same poem. The filter process in which these inable-edged adjective man best adjective is "Remit times of the Ar Notice in the same interest of the hydron and the highest of the latitude in the Open I sales in the posterior of the best of the portra women, and the posterior of the best woman. He will notice the sounded ed final, such a marked char latic of the earlier work of Keats and Tennyson:

> "Were fixed shadows of thy fixed mood Revered Isabel, the crown and head."...

There are same half dozen others, and they he spail the poem. They are greatly in excess. O other hand, the only example in "Mariana"—gna is beautiful. Also in "Isabel" we seem to discover of prose that would startedly be intentional:

"A clear stream flowing with a muddy one."

"MARLINA. In the volume of 1833 is a childed "O Line, Love, Love!" to which is precontrol from Sapple that suggests the source of the lines, and guides us to classic origins of the others. In a later edition the title of the changed to "Fathma," and a new stanza is ich makes mention of a more a vastery to tera or a ming for summae. Wildring in 1.7th of it is to 1. Berning the sporth. This stimulation is one of 1.1th a em mus ready for a retiral human figure ( ) to . enum of the situation of as a inferrel on Fig. . ... in the at in the same major the nucley and of this year g Bare hidem sketcheld fortug bushra in hid e bis ume no the françament las planations else nnich ny nin kay gestkishme ng til his and die hall bet fhats has lynniel nors som older alle och le Miglare. Further strong for a control based of Migration and the form of the control of the control of the cone alfalle "Feems", To Boule Williams (Co.) our Shakespeare supplies the rount of the salves of en mennondå that to "lore to B. . . 's . . . . . . . . . . . . . toem in many resource the "I'd the the or to the ich eremoù alome la avetchell, al foit la 1800 d' simpe sunsitie mambe for the distantial for the air van for his Rosalino - Factbert as "Martina" socstell for reasons on he would not on a contract are sker bus, miliar und in the Shiphill Milliam to a in that stands to the interest of the section in the section ' f & TLT.s

This patiently of the transition of the composition is a control of the composition in the composition is a control of the composition in the composition is a control of the composition in the composition is a control of the composition in t

Gray's Elegy bespeak the subject. In that poem, the time element, the daily round. Mariana was sevening, midnight, morn; but evening, as in the stanza, and in similar passages by other poets, wa saddest of all.

Few changes have been made in this masterpiece or two deserve mention. The last line but four i last stanza read originally:

"Downsloped was westering in his bower," a worse line with something of Milton in it. In the edition many of the compounds—"marishmosses"—without the hyphen; some clisions, "up an' away, the pane," have judiciously been altered. The me original and fascinating. A few other interesting ticulars will be reserved until "Mariana in the Science to be considered. A note on the use of the popast indefinite in this poem will be found at the ethe Chapter (Appendix II.).

The portrait of Mariana may have been taken the "Isabella" of Keats; or from Sappho δέδυκε μὲν ἄ σελάννα καὶ Πληϊάδες, μέσαι δὲ νύκτες, παρὰ δ'ἔρχετ' ὥρα, ἔγω δὲ μόνα κατεύδω, or from Henryson's "Testament of Cresseid":

"On this wyse, weiping, scho maid hir mone . . . . Weiping, scho woik the nicht fra end to end."

(8) "To——." This is another evidence of the int taken by Tennyson in the new religious energies o day. We are reminded of the poem "To the Rev. I Maurice." The epithet "clear-headed" is unfortuperhaps the most unfortunate in the volume.

(8, "MADELINE." In the former poem we had "fainged;" here is "sun-fringed;" here also "light dow," and a host of others, especially fanciful cominds. Outwardly the most striking feature of the two ems is their abundance of the tricks of diction already erred to. It is the determination to be brilliant that troys the lustre.

- 9) "THE OWL" has something Shakespearean about first part. The poem exhibits Tennyson's fondness animate nature. Hereafter in "The Swallow Song," laud" and "The Throstle" he will repeat in verse the es of other and sometimes sweeter birds.
- 9) "RECOLLECTIONS OF THE ARABIAN NIGHTS." A Illiant series of poetical magic-lantern slides that move fore us to a music equally brilliant; probably there is more striking achievement of musical word-painting in language. Something of the manner is caught from leridge; much of the material is Shelley's; but the enable is original and beautiful.
- II) "ODE TO MIMORY." Another characteristicem, though due to many poets in its parts. It has been iced incidentally on pp. 57, 72, 77. Some of the depitive passages would be excellent if they were not overdied; they can scarcely be disembarrassed of their own ort or of their burden of borrowed beauty. Neverthes the Ode is thoughtful, well constructed, full of promise, d, again, in its entirety, original.
- 13. "Song." This must be regarded as the worst poetry have yet met with; the refrain especially is weak.
- (13) "A CHARACTER." Five stanzas of Wordsworth's A Poet's Epitaph," beginning "Physician art thou," are most probably the groundwork of Tennyson's "Charac Other suggestions may have been supplied by Sh speare, "I. Henry IV.," I. iii. 30-68, where, after fight, Hotspur is pester'd with a popinjay; and w Jaques recounts his meeting with the fool ("As Like It," II. vii. 12-42). The latter passage may I furnished the expression "Lack-lustre eye." Stri resemblances may also be found in the sketch of Ach in "Troilus and Cressida," Act II., Scene iii., such as "He doth rely on none . . .

<sup>1</sup> Song at the end of "Love's Labour's Lost."

In will peculiar, and in self-admission," which may be compared with,

"And stood aloof from other minds In impotence of fancied power;"

or again,

"He that is proud, eats up himself;"

with

"Upon himself himself did feed;"

and again,

"Possess'd he is with greatness, And speaks not to himself but with a pride That quarrels at self-breath,"

with

"And trod on silk, as if the winds Blew his own praises in his eyes."

The piece, therefore, may be regarded as an "exp ment;" and its manner reminds us of the satire in " Dreams," which also seems to have been suggested Shakespeare.

(13) "THE POET." Of the "Intellectual All-in-a sketched in the former poem we are told "Yet could not all creation pierce Beyond the bottom of his eye."

<sup>1</sup> Wordsworth, "A Poet's Epitaph," ch an one would "botanize Upon his mother's grave," to no blossom there could fill his heart with thoughts a deep for tears: his "lack-lustre dead blue eye" ght never penetrate beyond the sordid fact. But the let, according to Tennyson, is primarily a Seer.! And ain, in "The Poet's song":

"He sings of what the world will be When the years have died away."

is poom has already been referred to.2 It remains be repeated here that Tennyson's conception of "The et" is not exactly artistic. Thought has precedence er emotion, morality over beauty. It is much the me in "The Palace of Art." Had he been musician, painter, or both, had he possessed Browning's apeciative fondness for those airs," he might have done ore justice to the singer as such, and have claimed for n first-or demanded of him first-the faculty of sons. other words, he would have distinguished between the totional beauty of the artist, and the moral or inteltual beauty that the great artist shares with less compreasive souls. The greater includes the less; the poet ist be a singer first, as was Tennyson. Fortunately theories did not affect his practice: Wordsworth was s happy with his theory of over familiar and therefore nnatura' " poetic diction. To Werdsworth, moreover, nothing is owed by this stately been, and something 14) "THE PORT'S MIND." Suggested, it is said, by disparaging temarks of some university friends. It is angely earnest. It may be compared with the equally mest thought of "In Memoriam," xciv.

See some private see that the second of the

The remarks made upon the preceding poem app also to this protest, which, however, is as youthful aspect as "The Poet" was mature.

(15) "THE SEA FAIRIES." This is the first of sever poems, mostly classical in subject, and often appropriate modernized, which give expression to a feeling old-wor in its first aspect, but soon claimed by a modern humani ε'ς πόσον ὰ διλοί καμάτας κ'είς ἐργα ποιείμες; "Let us eat a drink, for to-morrow we die," -such are earlier statement of this particular feeling:

"Were it not better done, as others use, To sport with Amaryllis;"

such is the form it assumes in "Lycidas;" and in Tenr son's next volume we shall find it splendidly develop in "The Hesperides" and "The Lotos-Eaters:"

> "Is there any peace In ever climbing up the climbing wave?"

Besides the very original blank verse at the beginning lyrical movement equally Tennyson's own, appears in t musical and richly coloured composition. Some of imagery finds resemblances in Shelley:

"The Nereids under the green sea,
Their white arms lifted o'er their streaming hair,
With garlands pied, and starry sea-flower crowns."
Prometheus Unbound.

As to the subject of the poem, a first suggestion may found in the following lines:

Δεις' αγ΄ λες τελέαςς' 'Οδυσει, μεγα νέες' Αχαιές. νηα κατάστησον, Ίνα νωτέρην δες ἀκούσης. Odvssev, XII. 184-5.

(15) "THE DESERTED HOUSL." These verses combut little poetry. They appear to have been written we the poet could still possess his "early heaven."

<sup>1</sup> See p. 142. 2 "In Memoriam," xxxiii,

(16) "THE DYING SWAN." No poem in the volume is free from affectation in respect of diction. In "The Dying Swan" these blemishes are less frequent than usual; but, as it is a well-known composition, they shall be mentioned in detail.

"Under-roof," "under-sky," an "inner" voice, "adown," took the reed-tops," "took the soul;" of these latter two he prototype is the well-known passage in "Cymbeline:"

"Daffodils
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty."

And in Milton, "Took with ravishment. . . ." But such uses of the verb "take" are mostly classical,—"Quacque nihi sola capitur nunc mente voluptas"—and Tennyson may have being tasting the waters higher up the stream of song. The opening description of the second division of the poem has already been noticed as existing in part in the "Poems by Two Brothers" and elsewhere. "At its own wild will" is in Wordsworth's sonnets. Noticeable also are "marish," "marish-flowers." "Joy hidden in sorrow" occurs often, from "Poems by Two Brothers" to "The Gardener's Daughter":

"Which perfect joy, perplext for utterance, Stole from her sister, sorrow," or "In Memoriam":

"In the midmost heart of grief Thy passion clasps a secret joy."

To these may be added "Afar," "anear;" "tumult of their acclaim" may be compared with "Is wrought with tumult of acclaim" ("In Memoriam"). The "creeping mosses" are often met with; also "the wave-worn horns" the "horned flood" of "In Memoriam," and, in a different application, the "horned valleys" of the "Supposed Confessions of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind." All the above words or phrases are used frequently by the poet, especially at this early period; some, such as "under," "inne "marish," so often that they become something more th mannerisms. As a further remark on a subject of st peculiar interest, we may say that they evidence - and th are more striking examples in other poems, the m studious collecting of poetical curiosities on record, M poets make a note of this phrase or that, and perhaps st up choice words and images from nature; but no poet made such systematic use of them, or experimented w them so repeatedly. In this poem, short as it is, some employed twice over: "took," for example. We mi account for the repetition of "under" and "marish," not of "took." Tennyson never quite freed himself fa this foible of word worship or this fault of repetition; 1 it be apparent to every careful student of the poet. On other hand we must remember that our English ton owes not a little of its wealth and power and beaut these very researches and experiments. It is partly because such mannerisms are fewer, obvious, and less obtrusive, that "The Dying Swan" notable poem; nor has it undergone much alterat But there is very much more to say. The poet's tr ment of nature was explained on p. 73; but again the is much to add, and it should not be in the form of planation. Many years ago, when the present writer read the usual schoolboy's Latin, Greek, English, French poetical surprises. But one day he chanced of a quotation from "The Dying Swan" in Chambe "Encyclopædia of English Literature," and among "surprises" the emotion of that moment became he forth perhaps the most memorable.

The poem is indeed a remarkable one. Together "Mariana" it proclaimed the advent of a poet orig

<sup>1</sup> See note on Mannerism, p. 54.

enchanting, and possibly great. The second section of the poem is the finest, as it is also the most characteristic siece of poetry in the volume of 1830.

But the Pre-Raphaelite first section is also very fine; inder the spell of the emotion symbolized, its realism becomes transformed into an ideal beauty that transcends all reality. Following these, the third section swells in a full crescendo, till it closes with a flood of music.

(16) "A DIRGE."

"Thou diedst, a most rare boy, of melancholy."

The remainder of the scene from which this line is taken ("Cymbeline," IV. ii. 208) may have suggested Tennyson's "Dirge." "Thou thy worldly task hast done" corresponds to "Now is done thy long day's work." Other resemblances, especially in the flowers," may be left to the reader. The poem is not very good; "folds thy grave" is rather a strained expression, and there are other weaknesses. Here is "light and shadow" once more. The occasional change from trochaic to iambic measure is well managed.

(17) "LOVE AND DEATH" is a poem generally admired. The sentiment is partly

"Our weakness somehow shapes the shadow, Time," Princess.

which, in "The Mystic," reads thus:

"One shadow in the midst of a great light, One reflex from eternity on time;"

Which again is Shelley's ("Adonais"):

"The One remains, the many change and pass;
Heaven's light for ever shines, earth's shadows fly;

Line 260.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Long purples" (printed as a sprotation in 1st edition) are well known in "Hamlet."

Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass, Stains the white radiance of eternity, Until Death tramples it to fragments."

The expression "what time," so much affected by minor poets (in imitation of Milton's anglicised Latin), does not occur often in Tennyson; only—if we remember rightly in "The Princess," and in some minor or cancelled poems. "Gathering light" is "Colligit ignes" of the "Georgics" i. 427; the word "vans," found also in an inferior sonnet of the 1830 volume, is used by Milton and others. "Lustrous" occurs as a stock word, as do "sheeny," and "parted," and "eminent." The poem is built up of fifteen lines, linked by rhyme, and having a climax at the ninth.

(17) "THE BALLAD OF ORIANA" is effective, but weak occasionally. It is a most difficult poem to read aloud because of the frequent refrain. It appears to have been suggested by other ballads written to memorize the death of Helen of Kirkconnel, who threw herself in front of her lover, received the bullet aimed at him by a rival, and then died in his arms. Tennyson's version is not so simply pathetic as the best of the Helen of Kirkconnel ballads:

"Curst be the heart that thought the thought
And curst the hand that fired the shot,
When in my arms burd Helen dropt
And died to succour me:"

so in Tennyson, "O cursed hand! O cursed blow!" And his "O breaking heart that will not break," is like the fragment in "Troilus and Cressida:"

"O heart, O heavy heart, Why sigh'st thou without breaking."

All nature, as usual, mourns with the mourner: this is very well done, and some of the lines are wonderfully graphic in their condensation;

&quot;When the long dun wolds are ribb'd with snow

The high sounding name "Oriana" is not unknown in literature. Farquhar uses it for one of his characters in "The Inconstant." Queen Elizabeth was called Oriana in some contemporary madrigals.

(18) "CIRCUMSTANCE." This word, as we have seen, was becoming an object of anxious interest to the poet. No wonder that he should have eased his heart by expanding the terrible abstract term into concrete poetical form. The poem has admirers, and is often quoted; but it is not very remarkable. As to the word itself, it appears in "The Mystic" as "wayward vary-coloured circumstance," in the "Supposed Confessions" as "the grief of circumstance," and it will be conspicuous so late as the "Lines to the Duke of Argyle," - "This ever-changing world of circumstance." The thought has some slight affinity with the doctrine of "Dualisms": "

"Two children lovelier than Love adown the lea are singing, As they gambol, lilygarlands ever stringing:
Both in blosmwhite (sic) silk are frockéd . . .
Like, unlike, they sing together
Side by side,
Midmay's darling goldenlockéd,
Summer's tanling diamondeyed." 3

(19) "THE MERMAN—THE MERMAD." Like "The Sea Fairies," these poems are vivid and musical. They may be called trifles in the volumes of Tennyson, but they would look more than pretty in the pages of a lesser poet. They exhibit his accustomed wealth of diction, in which they often resemble Shelley and Keats; and they have much witchery of sound. Also they are distigured by some of the blemishes so incident to this volume; among their mannerisms may be noticed the word "inner."

(20) "ADELINE." (21) "MARGAREL." (22 "ROSALIND."

<sup>1</sup> See p. 37. The word is similarly used by Keats.

<sup>2</sup> One of the poems of this volume which were not republished.

<sup>3</sup> These lines are printed as above in the first edition.

(22) "ELEANORE." Of these, "Adeline" alone belongs the volume of 1830; the other three appeared first 1833. In "Adeline" we hear echoes of former poe "Breathing Light (with its capital, to make the more it) against thy face," occurs more than once in Shelle "And move like winds of light"; "Nor unhappy, nor rest" may be compared with Scott's "Were neit broken, nor at rest." This poem has been mentioned poets, as furnishing numerous examples of Tennyscoccasional weakness in poetic style.

(22) "ELEÄNORE" recalls Shelley more than a do times, and many other poets, ancient and modern, er into its elaborate composition. But in a volume such as present, the subject of parallel passages like that of poor diction must be dealt with incidentally rather than s tematically; the reader is to be kept in mind of existence of parallelisms, rather than supplied with exhaustive list of them. Yet nothing is more conduct to a thorough knowledge and, finally, an appreciation Tennyson, than attention to these constructive deta The same holds good with several other poets, nota Milton and Virgil. One resemblance to another p may serve as an example of the rest; "Tresses confined" occurs in Byron's "Maid of Athens." As gards diction, "Eleanore" is almost as rich in pictures words, phrases, and imagery as the "Arabian Nigh And we must bear in mind its date, 1832,

The poems describing women are generally regard as mere exercises or fancy sketches. But there is lidoubt that many of them are taken from real life, a some at least are a half expression of "love first lear in a lady's eyes," of which some poems no longer publishalso seem to give evidence.

he cuckoo flower," which in "The May Queen" makes sense faint with its sweetness. But in this poem its grance is hardly perceptible. Here again are "amber" and the figure "sit between and woe" is a familiar one. "Burning brain" and ne other expressions are in Shelley.

22) "ROSALIND" was for a time withdrawn from pubtion. As the poem stands it is not without spirit, and well adapted to the character. In the original a note a added, which, like a similar note in "The Palace of "," enables the poet at once to reject and to retain a tion of his poem:

Perhaps the following lines may be allowed to stand a separate poem; originally they made part of the t, where they were manifestly superfluous."

This note is followed by thirty-three lines containing ch that is interesting: "Full-sailed before a vigorous id;" "full-sailed," probably from Shakespeare's intes, appears often; in "Eleänore," for example, and a "Supposed Confessions." In "The Princess" we d "That sail'd Full-blown before us," which is a curious riation. The lines:

"Fresh as the early seasmell blown Through vineyards from an inland bay," another reminiscence of Continental scenery; and the ssage

"Because no shadow on you falls Think you hearts are tennisballs To play with, wanton Rosalind?"

tifies to the good taste of the poet who withdrew e piece. Some might fancy there was too much of The Skipping Rope" in the last quotation. Eleänore is the last portrait hung in Tennyson's gallery of fa ladies. Horace and Byron have been indicated a furnishing models for the later poet; also Skelton, wi his verses to Maistresses Margery Wentworth, Isabe Pennel, and Margaret Hussey. To these poets man others might be added. Like Rosalind, Skelton's Ma garet Hussey is compared to "faucon Or hawke of the toure."

<sup>1</sup> See Introduction to next chapter.

(24) "MY LIFE IS FULL OF WEARY DAYS" is four in the volume of 1833. There it is addressed "To—The line "Ring sudden scritches of the jay," in which we have another but not so fortunate example of bir notes, originally read "Ring sudden laughters of the jay "Laughter" was to be reserved for the wood-pecker—"A laughters of the wood-pecker." These verses are spound by the over-subtle pathos of the closing couplet, which really amounts to bathos. On the other hand, how su cessful is the fall at the end of the "Lady of Shalote" He said, she has a lovely face; "successful also, spin of the rhyme, is the last line but one of "The Lord Burleigh": "In the dress that she was wed in."

(24) EARLY SONNETS.

- (24) I. "To—." Published in 1833. This is after wards compressed into two well-known stanzas in "Tl Two Voices," 127 and 128—"Moreover something is seems," etc. The familiar phenomenon is referred in other poems, such as "In Memoriam," xliv. See also Appendix to Chapter VII.
- (25) II. "To J. M. K." (1830). This was John Mitch Kemble, at Cambridge with Tennyson, afterwards so we known as an authority in early English literature at ory. He was intended for the church, but devoted life to literary work. Here is Tennyson's sympathy hathe new stir in the church, referred to on p. 81.

<sup>1</sup> From "Kate," in the volume of 1932. Also in "The Princess," thote of this bird is compared to laughter ("Prologue," 210-211).

structed; the third line is especially poor. Two tres from the sea partly neutralize one another. It is be interesting to note the old spelling "it's" in the ginal. Faulty as it may be, three of its lines will immend themselves to all:

"Mine be the power which ever to its sway Will win the wise at once, and by degrees May into uncongenial spirits flow."

- 25) IV. "ALEXANDER." Mr. Collins remarks that allusion to the naphtha pits shows that the poet had in reading Plutarch's "Life of Alexander." As in ersia," some rhythmic music is derived from proper nes.
- 25) V. "BUONAPARTE." Published in the 1833 volume. may be counted among the patriotic poems. The are at the close is characteristic; several of the earlier nets and short poems end in a similar manner.
- 26) VI. "POLAND." Tennyson does not take much neart the fortunes of other lands than England; but the volume of 1833 there are two sonnets on the ject of Poland. This one is entitled "On the Result he late Russian Invasion of Poland," and the other is Vritten on hearing of the outbreak of the Polish urrection."
- 26) VII., VIII., IX. These sonnets, bearing the "Three sonnets to a Coquette," first appeared in

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Poems by Two Brothers,"

"A Selection from the Works of Alfred Tennyson," pr lished by Moxon in 1865. Whatever their actual da they are a striking contrast to the others that surrou them. With these they claim kindred only in respect the figures at the end of VII. and IX. Having due gard to the subject, we may yet pronounce their many to be wholly different. Though not full-bodied nor trump toned, they are as original as they are beautiful. T last sonnet we were examining was slightly Miltonic, not good. These resemble nothing in all preced literature; they are new in many ways, in delicate gra perfection of form, but, most of all in the movement the verse. That is as much Tennyson's own as the ve of "Tithonus," or a dozen other pieces that might mentioned; only here, lest the sweetness should clov discord breaks up the cadence at the close of the ser Five of the lines consist of monosyllables finely modulat One of the similes is very beautiful:

> "Sadder than a single star That sets at twilight in a land of reeds," and may be compared with Wordsworth's

"Fair as a star, when only one Is shining in the sky,"

These sonnets found many imitators, but they have seld or never been surpassed in their special excellence.

(27) X. This is the second of two sonnets in the I volume. The first opens with the lines:

"O beauty, passing beauty! sweetest Sweet! How canst thou let me waste my youth in sighs?"

And this second sonnet continues, "But were I loved. It has been retained as much the better of the two; an ends with the usual Tennysonian figure. Although super to some of the others, it should be compared with the for three: it will hardly fail to make their perfection m parent. In those there was no redundant syllable to stroy the superb grace of movement; no such line as all the inner, all the outer world of pain," lines that may found frequently in the sonnets of Mrs. Browning, for ample. The figure "Fresh-water springs come up ough bitter brine," is employed in an improved form "Enoch Arden":

"And beating up through all the bitter world, Like fountains of sweet water in the sea."

27) XI. "THE BRIDESMAID." This is going to the per extreme. There were halting lines in Sonnet X., t it was fairly good: here it is difficult to discover ength or beauty. "The couple" alone would condemned work, even if the second line had not condemned it eady.

This ends the series of poems styled "Juvenilia," most of nich, though sometimes in an altered form, were published the volume of 1830. A few comments will now be made those poems of the 1830 volume, that are not included nong the "Juvenilia." Of these the number is conlerable; no less than twenty-two of the original fiftyree contained in "Poems, chiefly Lyrical," having been ected. The opinion has already been put forward, that poet's genius is to be measured not only by what he tains, but also by what he rejects; and since some of ese remaining twenty-two pieces are astonishingly weak, e can afford to be less severe on the unfortunate critics no failed to discover the greatness even of a poet who uld write "Mariana" and "The Dying Swan"; and, range to say, this is equally true of the next volume. It may be well to state here a general fact to which tention should be directed; a poem or some portion of a poem is often found to be omitted, apparer because it contains a too obvious imitation of some of poet.

Such, for example, might be the case with a sonner some merit, in which—in the manner of Keats—

"All night through archways of the bridgéd pearl, And portals of pure silver walks the moon," like which the poet's soul must "Turn cloud to light, and bitterness to joy, And dross to gold with glorious alchemy."

There is something of Shakespeare in the last line. A in the line

"An honourable eld shall come upon thee,"

"eld" looks like Byron's property. Other and m obvious cases will be mentioned in succeeding chapter

Also it is interesting to notice the very large num of phrases in these rejected verses that subsequently fa place in later poems; from the line "When the f matinsong hath wakéd loud," the poem "Memory" s plies material to "Love and Duty" and "In Memoria: In "The Grasshopper," the passage "Thou hast no cor of years, No withered immortality," makes "Tithom the richer—

"Me only cruel immortality consumes; I wither slowly. . . ."

And "The Mystic" with its "Daughters of Time, divintall," adds a grace to the "Dream of Fair Women:"

"A daughter of the gods, divinely tall."

From the poems afterwards published as "Juvenil many mannerisms were expunged, such as "blosse starréd shore" from "The Poet's Mind"; and we the fore expect to find in the condemned poems a larger portion of these experiments or tricks of style. Of sounded "éd" final the most remarkable example is t oted on p. 95 in the extract from "Dualisms," where her curiosities of diction will be found, as also a recoltion of Keats' "Mid-May's eldest child."

Probably the most characteristic fragment of diction to met with in these experimental poems is the following e from "The Mystic,"

"Keen knowledges of low-embowéd eld," ich, however, is not so bad as the metaphysical poet's

"Knowledge's first mother is invention."

ere we meet with Byron's "eld" again. Of course, ld" belongs to other poets, to Keats, for instance, as in razéd eld"; but it was affected by Byron in his earlier see.

An account of these poems scriatim would be extremely eresting, but it must be left for a larger work. Among most important are "The Mystic," already referred which contains another reference to the condition of nce into which Tennyson seems occasionally to have len (pp. 62, 63):

"He often lying broad awake, and yet Remaining from the body, and apart In intellect and power and will, hath heard Time flowing in the middle of the night, And all things creeping to a day of doom."

other is "The Sleeping Beauty," a very good beginning what was afterwards to become a beautiful poem in the ume of 1842. "Hero to Leander" is a striking reproction of Shelley's erotic verse, with an admixture of ats. The book ends with a people, which, though ensibly ironical, contains such lines as A nickname given to the Heraclitean philosophers who maintained, as of their doctrines, that all things were in a state of perpetual change or ux," or "becoming." These old-new philosophies really commended nselves to Tennyson in many of their aspects; hence the words "oscibly ironical" above. In this connection the poem may be compared a "The Mystic" and others.

"But if I dream that all these are, They are to me for that I dream," which was afterwards to become, in "The Higher Patheism,"

"Dreams are true while they last, and do we not live in dreams?"

And the argument at the close, "Argal—this very opin is only true relatively to the flowing philosophers," is a so good as Byron's

> "When Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter, And proved it, 'twas no matter what he said."

APPENDICES TO CHAPTER III.

APPENDIX I.

The high pleasure of art is found in a more even cont between the forces of irregular emotion and the laws regular expression; in a nice adjustment of impetue thought to well-defined art form. If we cannot discorsome law in obedience to which every portion of the a structure is harmoniously adjusted to every other portion and to the whole, then the symmetrical element destroyed, and the work ceases to be a work of art. (Stabothe remark on Form in Drama, in Chapter XIV.)

Of course this law will operate with more or less strigency, according to the period, temperament, and environment of the writer; it will vary as fashions vary, and the exactly the same reason. It will vary even in the same invidual. Let us take Shakespeare for an example, noticed already on p. 64, when he begins to write blat verse he does not exactly count syllables or accents his fingers, but he does this; as far as possible he mak sentence or phrase coincide with the line; and thus to ight helps to measure the line, and saves the beginner h anxiety and trouble. He makes his foot of a form pattern: in each line he pauses at the natural e-after the second foot: for there is no middle in a of five feet: and the strong stress which marks the se will be laid on the shorter first portion of the line, that is trikes the earlier syllables of an English as v means of these and many other devices that could nentioned he "measures" his verse with the maximum ertainty and the minimum of trouble; but the resultuniformity is dangerously near to monotony. This is opposite extreme: a too rigid application of rule. will on occasion write such uniform verse even when has mastered his art, but then we shall always recogboth his purpose of effecting a contrast and the beauty he expedient. Passing on, however, to such a play as he Tempest," we have before us blank verse so varied ts structure that the old devices of formal foot, regular ise, and end-stopt line are altogether disguised. - but destroyed; the most obvious of structural elements, very lines themselves, headed by their capital letters. nost give place to new lines that reach from pause to ise and the pauses may occur anywhere : and so with other structural elements. But amid all this variety never fail to recognize if not the old law, at least what y be called a "law within the law." Such poets as epherson, Tupper, and Whitman abuse the licensed y of variety within uniformity; and many others at nes assume a freedom that perplexes rather than

These remarks apply with as much teach to the structure poems themselves as to the structure of their parts. The ide," which is considered in Chapter VIII., is not often reessful in English; Gray scrarigid example which few or no could tollow; but these irregular poems of Tennyson's first volume seldom exhibit such symmetry of form as rank them with the "Ode." They are more like som the lyrics in "Maud," which from one point of view midble regarded as an unsuccessful compromise between che and drama, but were probably suggested by the song Dry wrote for the madhouse scene in "The Pilgrim." We retherefore assign to the irregular poems of this volume remarks which will be found in the chapter on "Mau adding, however, that the very important symmetrelement of rise, culmination, and decline is observation the construction of some of the pieces, such "Claribel" and "Lilian."

APPENDIX II.2

"In order to realize the surpassing excellence Tennyson's workmanship, we may compare his so 'Home they brought her warrior dead,' with the follow lines on the same theme in 'The Lay of the Last Minstreanto i., section 9; and even when we have made favour of Scott all necessary allowances, we shall plably be astonished at the superior finish and ta displayed in the work of the later poet.

'But o'er her warrior's bloody bier The Ladye dropp'd nor flower nor tear!

! Entitled "Of a Scholar and his Mistress, etc."-

"Look, look, I see—I see my love appear" ("And I see my Oread coming down.")

"For like him there is none"
("There is none like her, none.")

And the metrical m veiner to f "C" me into the garden, Mand," is found the speech of Phyllis,

"Shall I marry the man I love."

<sup>2</sup> From "New Studies in Tennyson," pp. 68 and 69.

Vengeance, deep-brooding o'er the slain, Had lock'd the source of softer woe; And burning pride, and high disdain, Forbade the rising tear to flow; Until, amid his sorrowing clan, Her son lisp'd from the nurse's knee—"And if I live to be a man, My father's death revenged shall be!" Then fast the mother's tears did seek. To dew the infant's kindling cheek.'

'Just now I was directing your attention to the genius played by Tennyson in refining upon the excellences former poets, especially those of this century, and in nging them nearer to men's lives in a poetry of iking originality; but I forebore to point out, from the ny thousands, some one constituent element of that ginality, because any such example would serve equally ll to illustrate my present subject. From among the e or six hackneyed turns of expression in these lines by ott, I will select for your guidance this one, viz., 'did ek.' Now, such a poetical past indefinite tense may, cording to conditions of date, context, and the rest, be her a beauty or a blemish, and chiefly on this account; e law by which the comely hat of one year is conmned as the hat hideous of another year, operates also the region of poetical devices. In our earlier literature is 'did' tense, though perhaps employed to excess in penser and the immature writings of Shakespeare, is ually in good taste. Milton makes it beautiful in cidas; Pope condemns it; by his time it has become ut of fashion.' Yet Gray uses it with peculiar grace; naller poets at the end of the eighteenth and the beginng of the nineteenth centuries rendered it repulsive; me leading poets of the same period employed it with discretion; though well adapted to his manner, it is metimes a blemish in Keats, from whom it may have escended to Tennyson; it is a blemish in this passage om Scott; but when Tennyson revived its use, it was again made to produce the effect of 'pleasing sulprise In these lines from 'Mariana in the Moated Grange,' i is charming—nay, bewitching:

'When thickest dark did trance the sky . . .
For leagues no other tree did mark . . .
The poplar made, did all confound . . .

"Nothing, again, could be more beautiful than the employment of this word in the 'Lotos-Eaters,' although there it is appropriate rather as echoing Spenser and Thomson. On the same principle we justify and admir Mr. Swinburne's revival of not systematic, but abundan alliteration."

CHAPTER IV.

HE VOLUME OF 1833, OR, "THE LADY OF SHALOTT, AND OTHER POEMS."

HE date of this volume is sometimes given as 1832, for was published in December of that year; but the titleage reads, "Poems¹ by Alfred Tennyson, London: dward Moxon, 64, New Bond Street, MDCCCXXXIII." contains thirty poems, mostly short ones, which, gether with a long note beginning on p. 121, fill up the olume of 233 pages.

Of this second collection of poems the most striking paracteristics are the evidence of foreign travel, the acreased influence of Keats, and an extraordinary inquality of workmanship. Nevertheless, the poet advances of a greater perfection some of the best qualities of the ormer volume; more elaborately, as in "The Lotostaters" and "Œnone," he clothes an universal emotion a classic dress; the romantic ballad, richly wrought, is an important feature; he begins to treat moral questions a an allegorical manner and with greater earnestness, as a "The Palace of Art"; and, lastly, as in "The Miller's Daughter" and "The May Queen," he sings of the affections and the home and simple country life and scenery sonly an English poet could, and more sweetly than any ther English poet ever did.

<sup>1</sup> The words "Chiefly Lyrical" are now omitted.

(27) "THE LADY OF SHALOTT." This poem, whi stood sixth in the volume of 1833, will serve to illustrathe foregoing mention of inequality of workmansh Some poets, like Swinburne and Browning, seldom wra weak line; others, like Tennyson, and spite of the fathat "His worst he kept, his best he gave" will now an then give the people of their worst. As if to show he weakly he could still write, he ended the first stanza "The Lady of Shalott" as follows:

"The yellowleavèd waterlily, The greensheathèd daffodilly, Tremble in the water chilly Round about Shalott."

Tennyson never looked younger than that. The on difference is the change of accent from acute to grave. The following lines also occur in the original edition:

"Though the squally eastwind keenly Blew, with folded arms serenely. . . ."

there also the brilliant figure of fire-flies, used with muceffect by Shelley, adorns one of the stanzas. It is to leave the with again two or three times in the early poems. Tennyson, notably in "Locksley Hall." About seven of the lines in "The Lady of Shalott" have undergor change; others judiciously omitted are such as these:

"She leaneth on a velvet bed, Full royally apparalled;"

and again,

"No time hath she to sport and play."

But, with not more than one other comparison of the tex we shall understand that the earlier poem wanted not on the strength and finish? of the 1842 version, but also muc of its charm. And the same is true of other poems of the 1833 volume, notably "The Miller's Daughter," which was almost entirely spoilt by the first stanza alone.

<sup>1</sup> Acute in 1330, grave in 1333. 2 The rhymes, however, remain imperfer

The Lady of Shalott, and Other Poems.

Similarly it was the last stanza of "The Lady of alott" that most of all killed the charm of the poem:

"They crossed themselves, their stars they blest, Knight, minstrel, abbot, squire and guest. There lay a parchment on her breast, That puzzled more than all the rest, The wellfed wits at Camelot; "The web was unoven curiously The charm is broken utterly, Draw near and fear not—this is I, The Lady of Shalott:"

om the earlier version, however, we learn—if it is cessary to learn it—the much quested "moral" of this lliant romantic balled:

"She knows not what the curse may be; Therefore she weaveth steadily, Therefore no other care hath she. . . ."

is the "eclipsing curse of birth" into a world wherein capacity for higher enjoyment implies a capacity for gher pain. It is put into these two pathetic lines from ancelot and Elaine":

"Being so very wilful you must go. . . . Being so very wilful you must die. . . ."

its wider application the principle is set forth in n Memoriam";

"'Tis better to have loved and lost Than never to have loved at all."

"She lives with little joy or fear," 1

t to this must be added

"Like a beast with lower pleasures, like a beast with lower pains." 2

On the other hand, could mankind reverse the fourth anza of Part II. in "The Lady of Shalott," and see the vers in the moonlight first, and after that see the darkness and the funeral pall, there might be less of heabreaking. So much for "the moral" shut within the bosom of this rose.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The Lady of Shalott," 1st ed.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the whole of Poem xxvii., " In Memoriam."

The last stanza of the new version, besides being me excellent in every way, brings Lancelot to look on he brings, therefore, the whole poem nearer to the "Idylls the King," and gives us another glimpse of the poet as is at work on his great subject in the years 1833-18 We seem to gather that during this interval the idyll Elaine was under contemplation:

"And Lancelot later came and mused at her. . . . "

Among other correspondences, the web that was work curiously becomes in "Lancelot and Elaine" "The sill case with braided blazonings," and the parchment that on her breast is the letter that Arthur in the later legs spied in her hand.

The poem of 1833 has more in common with "Mariana" group; but there is this difference in eit version; nature changes with the mood or the situat of the figure it surrounds. In Part III, the advent Love is announced by a sun that dazzles through leaves and flames on the armour of Sir Lancelot; emblazoned shield sparkles amid the yellow harvest—so on with every stanza; and it was "All in the blue clouded weather." If a figure is employed, it will be the purple night and starry clusters, or it will be a brill meteor. How changed is everything when the curs come; as we read Part IV, it almost seems that eafelt the wound.

But without staying to notice other special art features of the poem, we must briefly remark that in for sound, and colour it is splendidly wrought; of things are at once new and beautiful it has enough, we malmost say, to found a whole school of poets—as it done in part. Rossetti's manner may often be traced magical influence of this ballad, as may some of inburne's music.

The "Lady of Shalott," as every one knows, is afterrds to be "The lily maid of Astolat." Sir Francis lgrave tells us that the poem was founded upon an lian romance. That some sort of prototype was found it more suggestive than Malory is certainly probable; t we may well be content in this instance to accept nnyson's great gift with a thankfulness that does not e to inquire further how it came into his possession.

(29) "MARIANA IN THE SOUTH." According to akespeare, the Moated Grange was situated near Luke's in Vienna; but, except for a vineyard, there is ry little scenery in "Measure for Measure." The names d the sentiments are Italian mostly-"I had as lief be ist of an English Kersey" says one of the speakers.

The scenery of "Mariana" in the earlier volume pears to be English, and often of the county of ncolnshire, if we may judge from such a line as:

"And glanced athwart the glooming flats," d from some passages in the "Poems by Two others."

Now, Tennyson has been travelling to the Rhine and lands of vineyards since he wrote the first "Mariana;" is we gather from "In Memoriam" and "O Darling oom;" also we know that he spent some time in the ighbourhood of the Pyrenees; hence he was brought mind of the fact that vineyards were not to be found in ngland; accordingly he composed another "Mariana" pem, putting in what "southern" scenery he could.

And he makes the most of this southern scenery. First of I, the line quoted above reappears in "The Gem" for 1831, his is Egypt, further south still. Tennyson was fond of the more or less indefinite "South;" it occurs again a again in his verse. "Fatima" looks "Athwart the burning drouth Of that long desert to the south," and thus suits the poem to her name. This recalls t "level" of the second line of "Mariana in the South As suggested elsewhere, the second stanza in "Fatim from which two lines have just been quoted may habeen left over from this "Mariana." But to ident all the scenery of the poem would be impossible. Fexample, an olive in the first edition becomes a will in the second. Very interesting is the "dry cicala" of t last stanza, seen by the poet in the Pyrenees; and oft mentioned by earlier poets; in "Œnone" it appearations with the lizard, as it does in Shelley:

"Looking athwart the burning flats."

<sup>1</sup> lxxi, and xcviii.

"The cicale above in the lime, And the lizards below in the grass," although the lizard was probably suggested by Theocrit We shall find the lizard also a little further on in tearlier version of "Mariana in the South."

To sum up, the first "Mariana" had been a success Tennyson, who might have felt the original Englisetting inappropriate to a lady placed in the south Shakespeare, takes the opportunity of resetting the then and in southern scenery, especially as he himself had been travelling "south." Mr. Churton Collins finds resemblance to Sestini's description of a "hapless was pining forlorn amid the torrid horrors of the Marenma. This is very probable: in either version of "Mariana the South," there is more of the Marenma landscape the any other.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In the Pyren es, where part of this peem was written, I saw a v beautiful species of cicala."—Tennyson, in note on "Enone."

&quot;The lizard, with his shadow on the stone Rests like a shadow, and the cicala sleeps."

<sup>3 &</sup>quot; Hymn of Pan."

The only relation that Tennyson establishes between two "Marianas" is contained in the note he attaches the second "Mariana," viz., "See 'Poems, Chiefly rical.'" But from the poem in its earlier form much re is to be discovered, too t such, we tear, for our ce. We have already seen that the poet identifies ch of the scenery of "(Enone" with the Pyrenees, and presence of the same citals in "Mariana in the ath" refers that detail also to the Pyrenees. This is the of many other poems in the volume of 1833. Else-tere Tennyson tells us that "veils of thinnest lawn" in "Lotos-Eaters" was suggested by the Pyrenees.

The following is part of the first stanza of "Mariana in South" as originally published:

"Behind the barren hill upsprung
With pointed rocks against the light,
The crag sharpshadowed overhung
Each glaring creek and inlet bright," ich is less like the Marenna: a vineyard also is roduced. Moreover, the lizard appears in this version, in a dream:

"The lizard leapt: the sunlight played."

iges support the conjecture of Mr. Collins

"Down in the dry salt-marshes stood That house darklatticed."

d other lines of the stand passess an interest that kes them worth quoting:

"Not a breath Swayed the sick vineyard underneath, r moved the dusty southernwood."

r many other purposes a study of original versions is ressary to a full or even an appreciative knowledge of rmyson. The reader would find the word "runnel" of latibel," the off repeated figure. The large leaves sed with one another," and pethans as namy as a hundred other lessons in poetical composition on one hand, and—what is also important—lessons in gradual evolution of Tennyson's grace, perfection, utterable charm.

In its present form, "Mariana in the South" is in so respects a better poem than its predecessors; nothing the volume of 1830 bears comparison with the sup second and third stanzas; 1 and to do Tennyson just they are not so much altered from the original as many other parts of the poem. The scenery is m "made up," but it is very effective. A variation on metre of the first "Mariana" was tried in this sectopoem, but subsequently abandoned, and rightly. present the two poems are nearly alike in metre.

(30) "THE TWO VOICES." This poem of 154 stanzas of published for the first time in the volume of 1842; it withen dated 1833, but the date was subsequently remove. The form of the verse is to be found in the "Ode on Death of Lord Byron" in "Poems by Two Brothe and there it is more appropriate, though of course of ployed with less skill. The stanza serves well enough for Threnody or a Litany; but it does not make very go poetry; least of all in such a long poem as "The Two which the Voice did urge reply," "Which did complish their desire," "Should that plain fact, taught by these;" or, for a whole stanza, what could flatter than the following:

"It spake moreover in my mind:
'Tho' thou wert scattered to the wind,
Yet is there plenty of the kind.'"

Here and there the verse becomes poetry-sometime

<sup>1</sup> With "her melancholy eyes divine," cf. Keats' "her maiden divine,"-Eve of St. Agnes.

my grand skeem (such to bli de one file scatule du ming in One but as the other mind to the one sers, dame it, help the tural for the public file et til ray to the thic erk all him. I bruit in the six all to and of horse help house the bound is a life tibe. Final thus the tien is included as rfied reak springs truspom e como og 1200 t i hearn subject. It is easy to time to the color e service de la como no objetimo de la calabó o calabó em. In hTru Am ert Sige igne sin i git i embles a weak line :

"The nicwood casses, bent with pain To men with what he new'll:

fit since employed to the court of the site of the second of e na tron, los asolins solar o de che arrora Section to the contract of the Tae Tan Milites — a lifte an mush lask luur ust musesii Suomian – uli tumu (j. 1864 uli fisi lu the blank verse of the later poem.

As a little surprise on the little of the Tolling test of Moses me hat betrer than hie mannen if gin must if i. tables and to us from the Williams Tay of the terms where ille. Dut offstittning a di maskan 🤼 um die in en en Bulletin Sensing Born and Born and Bulletin amuning a contract of the second against the second and substitution of the control of the substitution Delin less met hity in him to the suit authorized the e atomic posembgomina i a la lingua de la literación de la literación de la literación de la literación de la l e based in the Proposition of a complete plant at order as orders angle of the first of the Transfer and the first of th 4 Šer násturi strk – e 10 st.

Notice of the second of the second of the Company of the North Control of the second many things, choice between cavalier gallantry Puritan austerity, for example, or between pomp of ri and purity of character. His rule of life had to be cho rather than discovered. With Tennyson it was a different:

"Shall we not look into the laws
Of life and death, and things that seem
And things that be, and analyze
Our double nature, and compare
All creeds till we have found the one—
If one there be?"

This passage from the "Supposed Confessions of Second-rate Sensitive Mind" could hardly have be written by Milton; but we seem to hear it spoken all despondingly, or cheerfully, or manfully, or defiantly the case might be, not by Tennyson alone, but also Maurice, and Browning, and Carlyle. From one point view, as we have seen already, Truth is an everlast seeking; and this truth was the only rule of life poss to these eager souls, cast as they were by a somew violent wave of the Great Deep upon the shore of nineteenth century.

Many other names might be added of great meny were born into the world about the same time, and battle, each in his own way, with the spiritual, social, intellectual disorder of their day. Such were Newn Gladstone, and Ruskin. And later, when the centhad half run its course, the typical words quoted ab from the "Supposed Confessions" had to be said to again—and again despondirgly, or cheerfully, or n fully, or defiantly, or all these in one by Mattl Arnold, and Kingsley, and Claugh, and George E. Nor do these names by any means exhaust the list: poem of "The Two Voices" is the commencest sympamong sufferers from the malady of the age; and Maurice, born 1805; Browning, 1812; Carlyle, 1795.

 J. H. Newman, born 1801; Gladstone, 1809; Ruskin, 1819.

really earnest men and women have escaped that malady. They all have "renewed the quest;"1 their truth was an everlasting seeking.

Into the nature of their seeking or its results this is not the place to inquire; perhaps the best that they have left us may be found in one line of Matthew Arnold's "Thyrsis"-

"Roam on! the light we sought is shining still."

At any rate we must not expect to get a new and complete system of moral philosophy out of Tennyson's poems. We read Lucretius not in order to discover how worlds are made and unmade, but to steep our souls in mournful beauty. The merit of "The Two Voices" must be sought in the yearnings and the strivings of the heart of a great poet. Whatever consideration the grave doubts and answers there proposed seem to call for, will best be given to them in the notes on "The Ancient Sage," which was written as the result of lifty more years of doubting and answering.

Meanwhile it may be suggested that those who would gain for themselves some general knowledge of Tennyson's philosophy, should study the following poems as a group :- "The Two Voices," "In Memoriam," "The Higher Pantheism," "De Profundis," "Despair," "The Ancient Sage." There are others; but these are most akin; indeed any one of them will be found to repeat and occasionally to modify theories set forth in the others.

For example, from one point of view, "The Two Voices" may be regarded as "Despair" and "The Ancient Sage" thrown into one. We meet with a man "full of misery" almost the words used by Tennyson in the prefatory note to "Despair." A first voice advises death as the only remedy for ill. Against the more than twelveseveral persuasions and arguments of this "dull and bitte voice," the afflicted man advances many of the countrarguments of "The Ancient Sage." When the voice urges, "What were you before birth? Nothing! The die, and return to nothing" (107-111), it is met with rejoinder of many stanzas (112-128), some of whice embody the "Passion of the Past," which is so eloquent repeated in the later poem.

"The Two Voices" concludes in a manner which if irst sight is more poetical than convincing; but as state already, the point will be considered more fully on a late page. "This antenatal Past," the Voice resumed, "the walking of the soul from state to state is but a dreamy your pain is your only reality." "You have missed you mark" is the reply (130); "you attempted to shut me of from the future as well as the past; what I want is not death, but more life." The voice might have objected that this past and future was not proven; but it mere added mockingly "Behold, it is the Sabbath morn." "Cotto God's house the people prest. . . . One walked between his wife and child;" and while the man who has fought with his despair was looking at this picture of lov a second voice came to his ear and whispered of "hidden hope."

A brief analysis of the poem will be found in an Appendix to this chapter.

(36) "THE MILLER'S DAUGHTER." Again there very much to be learnt from a comparison of the earlieversion with the present; the following originally stood as the first stanza of the poem:

&quot;I met in all the close green ways,
While walking with my line and rod,
The wealthy miller's mealy face,
Like the moon in an ivytod.

He looked so jolly and so good-While fishing in the milldam-water, I laughed to see him as he stood, And dreamt not of the miller's daughter."

Such a stanza may fairly be described as a compound the very worst of Wordsworth, Cowper, and Campbell.

"Oh! that I were the wreath she wreathes, The mirror where her sight she feeds, The song she sings, the air she breathes, The letters of the book she reads."

e fifteenth stanza of the original seems to have been nitted partly because its last four lines just quoted bear close resemblance to some others in a chanson of nsard, which also supplies most of the song, "It is miller's daughter." Ronsard, moreover, enlarges on rious Greek originals.

The following may be noticed as one example of the ocess by which Tennyson refines his poetic metal; the e in the song, "About her dainty dainty waist," was in earlier copy "Buckled about her dainty waist." The ange reminds us of Browning's:

> "O the little more, and how much it is, O the little less, and what worlds away."

e improvements made in this song alone are perhaps many as fifty. This is the more remarkable, because eally is intended to be "A trifle" which nothing of etic art but only "true love spells;" such a song as ght have been written by "the long and listless boy" iself. The marvel is, that although so carefully elaboed, it gives us just that impression still. Another ret of the poet's art is revealed by the first edition. e song "Love that hath us in the net" is another trifle t true love and not true art is supposed to spell: for mple, with one exception all the rhymes are alike, and t again, is exactly the sort of verse we should expect from such a lover, who was a "rhymester" in his you and "over-garrulous in age." In the earlier vers another song took its place, but this had the sa characteristics, especially in regard to the rhymes.

Tennyson's unguarded manner is well exhibited by line "Rosecheekt, roselipt, half-sly, half-hy," or by " ver-paley," as an epithet of the cuckoo flower. Fina the original abounds with all those interesting pe liarities noted elsewhere, and it can hardly bear any co parison with the version of 1842.

This poem, as now perfected, needs no praise; i one of Tennyson's many masterpieces, and, again strikingly original. It has often been said of hur character as presented in the verse of this poet or the "How perfectly life-like; these men and women are familiar to us as the light of day; and this life, we it." In "The Miller's Daughter" there is someth more. An introductory note on "Nature in Tennyso gives expression to the opinion that in art we have best of man and nature when both are blended. In poem the blending of the two is so perfect that to o ceive of either as apart from the other is almost possible: to use a formula already found conveni "each seems to have called the other into existe and each for existence depends upon the other." ? comes of Tennyson's close and sympathetic study particular scenery in his native land; combined with assiduous practice begun long before in adapting e aspect of external nature to the particular forms of hw life which it environed in his poetic picture. This, it new perfection, is perhaps the chief charm of "The ler's Daughter," and of many poems to foilow. O beauties of the poem were pointed out on p. 109. final remark we may say that had "The Lady of Shal and "The Miller's Daughter" appeared in their present form in 1833, they might have been regarded as the most astonishing efforts ever put forth by a young poet. But whatever their date, it is still remarkable and admirable that two poems so novel, and so totally unlike, should be included in the same small volume. If "The Lady of Shalott" might have founded a school of poets, so might "The Miller's Daughter." A new wonder and delight was added to romance by the first of these poems, and to our common life by the second.1

<sup>1</sup> See p. 29, section iv.

(39) "FATIMA." The ultimate form of this poem seems to have been suggested by the two "Marianas," which in many respects it resembles. Originally it was called "O Love, Love, Love," and was preceded by the following quotation:

Daiveral mos xxvoc looc Beolow which takes the reader to Sappho's celebrated ode; but Tennyson's verse may be further indebted to Greek litera-

1 The following stanzas emitted from the early version possess great beauty, though some of it is sport by the manner san "under air," and the difficulty of the "whispering," spite of the second stanza:

> "Remember you the clear moonlight, That whiten'd all the eastern ridge. When o'er the water, dancing white, A lutetoned whisper, 'I am here!' I murmur'd, 'Speak again my love, The stream is loud: I cannot hear. "I heard, as I have seem'd to hear

When all the under-air was still. The low voice of the glad new year I heard, as I have often heard To left or right but falling floods,' ture, for Ibycus and Tatius are mentioned by Mr. Churton Collins as entering into its composition; and some slight resemblances are to be found in Ovid's "Sappho Phaoni."

The piece, therefore, is patchwork; and not the least curious bit of pattern is the second and additional stanza which, as already mentioned, determines the locality, and seems appropriate to the title. The merit of the poem is considerable; the four rhymes followed by three produce a fine effect of intense and prolonged emotion; indeed, music, imagery, passion, all are remarkable, and more than worthy to be the inspiration of Mr. Swinburne. Seldom does Tennyson allow himself such a passionate utterance perhaps only in "Love and Duty," and the stanzas in "The Tribute."

(40) "(ENONE." Those who compare the earlier with the later versions of Tennyson's poems, will probably be struck by the frequency with which an added beauty may be traced to another writer. This fact was referred to in the remarks on Plagiarism.3 Many instances might be given, such as "Large Hesper glitter'd on her tears,' in the last stanza of "Mariana in the South;" it replaces "Large Hesper overshone The mourning gulf," and it resembles "No light could glimmer on their tears" in "Hyperion," Such resemblances are numerous in the new edition of "(Enone;" the best known line in the whole poem, "And at their feet the crocus brake like fire," which was added in the 1842 copy, can be traced in part to Homer; and with some certainty; for in its company came other flowers not in the earlier version; and the figure at the end of the line may have been suggested

<sup>1</sup> P. 114. 2 See Chapter X. 3 P. 49.

<sup>4</sup> Judging from this very common characteristic of emendation in Tenny son, we may fairly conjecture that in many instances some beautiful expression in another poet was the scle occasion of the emendation. And all this again would be due to the immence as ununlation of past poetic wealth which Tennyson always had within easy view.

y Wordsworth's "Flowers that set the hills on fire." 1 The reference to Homer is made much clearer by the fact hat the lines in the context,

> "And o'er him flowed a golden cloud, and leaned Upon him, slowly dropping fragrant dew," re almost word for word with two lines in the context of he Homer-ביתו אב נבשבו או (בשמידו καλήν χρυσείην στιλ πναι δ' άπεπιπτ ο έκρσαι.

This example must be regarded as a typical one; and we vill now dismiss the comparison between the old and he new version by remarking that with the exception of "The Palace of Art," the "(Enone" of 1833 fails nore than any other poem of its final perfection in 1842.

The blank verse is very remarkable; though almost he first we have met with, it is excellent, and something new. Stateliness of movement, fulness of sound, are its :hief characteristics. These effects are produced partly by a careful employment of open and closed vowels, partly by avoiding a weak tenth syllable; the lines, though not necessarily end-stopped, have weight enough at the close o give emphasis to the turn of the verse, and majesty to he whole rhythm.

The poem, which seems to have been suggested by Theocritus and other classical writers, and still more closely resembles Beattie's "Judgment of Paris," is said o have shaped itself in the poet's mind while he was n the Pyrenees; accordingly, the first draft is filled n partly with Pyrenean partly with other scenery, some of it imaginary. In the revised version, as was noticed in the case of "Mariana in the South," there is less of the Pyrenees and more of imaginary landscape. The same is true of "The Palace of Art."

<sup>1</sup> Compare also the x, of x, x, x, of Set hooles (" (1. l. C. l. . . ).

Many bits of natural description from "Poems by Two Brothers" are worked into the sketch of the valley. In this way the poet secures a more perfect correspondence between the solitary figure and the scene of her sorrow -the ruin'd folds, the fragments tumbled from the hillsthan if he had gone with his pigments to Mount Ida and brought home on his canvas some real and revolting incongruity. As it is, earth hearkens to her cry, the stream is loud because of her wrongs, the very stars of heaven are trembling above her.

"Enone," "Hesperides," "The Lotos Eaters," and "Ulysses" are classical in outline, but mostly modern in sentiment. Just as in Shakespeare we meet with long passages that are really excrescent from the true dramatic growth, so in "(Enone" the speech of Pallas is the speech of the nineteenth century poet himself; it breathes of his sobriety, his love of order and law, his wisdom and -a word that cannot be written without apology-his goodness. There is little enough of the Greek in it.

The story of "(Enone" is summed up in one line of Ovid, "Sustinet (Enonen deseruisse Paris," But the one line stands between two Epics. For the mortals, or even the demi-gods of Greek tragedy, were as flies whom the high gods killed for their sport; and behind the stage of saddened nature on which (Enone plays her short, pathetic part, a banquet of the gods is spread, and Strife, (Enone had the gift of prophecy. This effective element Tennyson does not introduce as (Enone's; it would take away from the pity of her sorrow; but she will talk with the wild Cassandra, and hear her tell how the noise of battle is ringing in her cars. And we who also listen can dimly forecast the ten years war in Troy, and all its mighty issues.

<sup>144</sup> THE SISTER. This ballad is very slightly altered

com the form it took in the volume of 1833. The out of ogue elision in "turret an' tree" has been rectified. Byron, as we should remember, is still in the poet's mind. 'he well-known lines in "The Miller's Daughter,"

> "There's somewhat flows to us in life But more is taken quite away," vere a reminiscence of

"There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away;"

and in this poem,

"I kiss'd his eyelids into rest His ruddy cheek upon my breast" s very much like Byron's ("The Bride of Abydos",- "Come, lay thy head upon my breast, And I will kiss thee into rest.'

Tennyson's poem recalls some of the old ballad form, and some of the old ballad spirit, and adds a perfection nknown to both; but the subject is improbable, and not o attractive as that of Oriana.

(44) "THE PALACE OF ART." For the Introduction, To ---, with the following poem," and the ethical teachng of the poem that follows, see Tennyson as Artist, p. 33-43.

Probably no poem by Tennyson has received such areful revision as "The Palace of Art." It stands as the ntithesis of those fresh and forceful poetic masterpieces ith which we are so familiar in Shakespeare and many ther Elizabethans, in Scott, Byron, Shelley, and Burns. lowever composed, their work has at least the appearnce of freshness. Tennyson himself in "Will Waterroof" trusts that after his libation to the Muse he may ot find it necessary to > "Add and alter, many times Till all be ripe and rotten."

From the first, Tennyson was an imitative poet, and these also are the poets who elaborate. Yet if they succeed in removing all marks of painstaking, their work ha a value and a charm of its own, second only to the charm of impetuous passion and swift creative power. As yet painstaking has been apparent everywhere, but sometime in a degree so slight as to be scarcely a blemish. And we regard its presence almost with satisfaction when we reflect how important this very trifling with words and phrases and rhythms has been to a genius like Tenny son's; but for this the world could never have wondere at the flawless beauty of "Tithonus," "Come into the garden, Maud," "Tears, Idle Tears," "Early Spring," an other poems too numerous to mention.

In "The Palace of Art" of 1833 more traces of European travel are discernible than in the improved copy Rejected fragments are reserved to be made more beautful in future poems; among the pictures on the arra "Venus...glowed double on the blue;" in "The Princess" she becomes "a double light in air and wave; and the "streaming crystal" that flowed from her sides it this later poem, was in "The Palace of Art" the proper of another figure. Here too we have the explanation the woods that shook and the colour that danced about the flood in "The Princess;" for we catch "The gleat Of that great foambow trembling in the sun."

"She lit white streams of dazzling gas

In moons of purple glass" will be met with again in "The Princess" as a new and ingenious scientific device, worthy to rema though the vulgarized gas must go. But the gas, who first introduced, was good poetic material, like Milton artillery.

"Two sphere lamps blazon'd like heaven and earth,"

Again, "The Halicarnassean" becomes "The Caria

Artemisia strong in war." We have not exhausted the phrases transferred to "The Princess;" and a large number are left to be traced to other poems. Many other interesting lessons must be passed by. And it cannot be too often repeated that a study of these poems as first published is most useful if not essential to a knowledge of Tennyson; and the subject might well fill a volume.

Next we notice the poet's remark (appended as a note to stanza 14 in the original): "When I first conceived the plan of 'The Palace of Art,' I intended to have introduced both sculptures and paintings into it; but it is the most difficult of all things to devise a statue in verse. Judge whether I have succeeded in the statues of Elijah and Olympias."

Now Tennyson had drawn many pretty but artificial verse portraits of women; next, as in this poem, he reproduces pictures in verse; these, not being regarded as originals, but as copies, are admirable; on the other hand, the portraits of women had to be regarded as originals, and therefore were less successful. Of course, the pictures are original, "devised" by the poet; but they are supposed to be pictures, imagined as such, before they became verse. To create in the mind a piece of sculpture is very much harder than to call up in imagination a painting; harder also to reproduce the colourless, one-element form in verse. To describe sculpture, as Byron did, would be comparatively easy. This seems to be the poet's meaning. But his note serves a double purpose; it not only apologizes for any imperfections that might be discovered if his improvised sculpture were compared with Byron's wellknown descriptions; it also gives him an opportunity of bringing his two statues into public view; there was no appropriate place for them in the poem; and they were adroitly set up in a note.

Two other notes in the original are of sufficient interest to be included in this survey; the first is as follows:—

"If the Poem were not already too long, I should have inserted in the text the following stanzas, expressive of the joy wherewith the soul contemplated the results of astronomical experiment." It was pointed out on a former page, that Tennyson preaches to himself as well as to others: this habit he shares with many great masters, including Shakespeare. At first his enthusiasm for science was almost a passion, and sometimes in his earlier poetry it was a rival of love, as in "Locksley Hall." In this part of the poem especially we hear the poet speaking to himself:

"Regions of lucid matter taking forms, Brushes of fire, hazy gleams, Clusters and beds of worlds, and bee-like swarms <sup>1</sup> Of suns, and starry streams."

"These world-wonders," he would say, "I am overinclined to worship; you will find them all in some form or other in my carnest verse." The same view may be taken of other branches of knowledge excluded from the revised edition, but displayed with a purpose in the first.

The next note is explanatory of an expression that may have perplexed many readers of the later editions of the poem—

"Plato the wise, and large-brow'd Verulam, The first of those who know."

These were originally,

"Bold Luther, largebrowed Verulam, The king of those who know."

To the last line the following note was added:

" Il maëstro di color chi (sic) sanno."-DANTE, Inf. iii.

This then is not so much Tennyson's deliberate estimate of Bacon, as a convenient phrase from Dante. Bacon's was a mighty intellect, but he is scarcely entitled to the rank of king. That Tennyson felt this seems clear from the change made in the new edition, where Plato is put by the side of Verulam; "first" is substituted for "king," and "The first of those who know" may apply to both Plato and Verulam.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the similar figure in "Locksley Hall, and Shelley's "The Cloud.

In the version of 1833, more of the "moral" is given:

"And being both the sower and the seed . . . became All that she saw."

"Full of her own delight, and nothing else, My vainglorious, gorgeous soul...

"In deep or vivid colour, smell, and sound.
Was flattered day and night."

The stanza adopted in this poem is generally regarded as an invention of Tennyson's, but it was used by Vaughan. An example will be found in the Appendix to Chapter VII. It is not such a pleasing variation from the elegiac quatrain as the stanza employed in "A Dream of Fair Women," because the shortened second line spoils the effect of the three accent cadence at the close.

The scheme of the poem may have been supplied by G. Herbert's "The World."—

"Love built a stately house. . . . "

In Herbert's poem, the palace was razed to the ground,

"But Love and Grace took Glory by the hand And built a braver palace than before:"

in Tennyson it is to be left standing for future occupation by the repentant soul and those to whom that soul was bound by love.<sup>1</sup>

Other sources may be found in Ecclesiastes, ii. 1-17. Of the poem generally it may be said that originality, wisdom, and beauty are somewhat marred by a stiffness due in part to the stanza adopted, partly to a lingering suspicion of artificiality which the most studied elaboration failed to remove. The landscapes "copied" each into a stanza are new effects in poetry, and quite astonishing in their condensed truth and beauty. One of the best is the bit of English scenery—

<sup>1</sup> Towards the end of the poem the Soul herself becomes part narrator.

"And one, an English home,—gray twilight pour'd On dewy pastures, dewy trees, Softer than sleep,—all things in order stored, A haunt of ancient Peace."

As a rule, the shorter the poem, the more perfect should be the rhymes. This rule was violated in "The Lady of Shalott." Here the slightly imperfect rhymes, "trees" and "Peace," almost add a grace to the stanza. The beautiful expression, "softer than sleep," occurs in Shelley; and either poet may have had in mind Virgil's "somno mollior herba."

(49) "LADY CLARA VERE DE VERE" was printed for the first time in the volume of 1842. "The gardener Adam" of this edition was subsequently changed to "The grand old gardener;" but the newer phrase proved ambiguous, and therefore in 1875 the original reading was restored. Notice how suitably this poem follows "The Palace of Art," for it administers another rebuke to selfish pride: not pride of intellect and imagination, but pride of birth. True pride of birth is in "The Princess:"—"Our place is much; we two will serve them both." In other words, noble birth imposes the obligation of high-minded principles and noble actions.

The poem is very good, and is worthy of special notice for the numerous examples it affords of the wisdom of many set forth in a beautiful and permanent form by the wit of one; as for instance in the well-known line,

"'Tis only noble to be good."

(50) "THE MAY QUEEN." "The May Queen" and "New Year's Eve" belong to the volume of 1833, but the "Conclusion" did not appear till 1842. The first two parts underwent only slight alteration. One curious change was made in "New Year's Eve," where "The blossom on the blackthorn" takes the place of the older reading, "The may upon the blackthorn." It is just possible that the poet had been confusing the hawthorn and the blackthorn; yet—and judging from other passages—this is scarcely probable. He may have intended the association of the two shrubs to be a conventional one, such as is not unknown in country places. Yet again, if so, why the alteration? He has well changed "I shall hear ye when ye pass" to "I shall hear you when you pass."

How the stanza of "The May Queen" grew out of two quatrains of such a poem as "The Talking Oak" may be discovered by a glance at the first stanza of the "Conclusion." This is little more than eight lines of "The Talking Oak" rolled out two into one, omitting the alternate rhymes. We shall notice something similar in the history of the couplets of "Locksley Hall." In this iambic case, however, many extra syllables were needed to quicken the movement when the measure was adapted to a light theme, as in "The May Queen"; and other changes were introduced, such as a trochaic or monosyllabic fourth foot—"The night winds come and go, mother, upon the meadow-grass"; "To-night I saw the sun set: he set and left behind."

In the introduction to this chapter, some reference was made to the originality and beauty of "The May Queen." As in "The Miller's Daughter" (especially the last stanza) the effect is mainly produced by richness and novelty both of material and method disguised beneath an impression of the most perfect simplicity. We will take the following as an example:

"When the flowers come again, mother, beneath the waning light You'll never see me more in the long gray fields at night; When from the dry dark wold the summer airs blow cool On the oat-grass and the sword-grass, and the bulrush in the pool."

And first, in regard to the material; if we look closely into the stanza, we shall notice two pairs of epithets, both entirely new, viz., "long gray," as descriptive of "fields," 1 and "dry dark" as descriptive of "wold": next, of the objects of nature themselves some will be new, but mostly simple enough to be unobtrusive: for example, the wold, the oat-grass, the sword-grass, and the bulrush; and, thirdly, the occasion of the whole stanza is novel, yet most appropriate; it is all in "the waning light." Next, as to the method: but this subject is inexhaustible; nor is it so clearly exhibited by a single stanza; it will perhaps be enough to point out that the bare sentiment is expressed by the words, "You'll never see me more"; but by reason of the amplitude of choice and the skill in choosing them; by their arrangement; by the tone they take from the context; and by the subtle sadness of the music, the very large proportion of materials from the natural world which go to make up the stanza are so charged with the emotion of the articulate sentiment that although inarticulate they express it over again with an infinite pathos; and, last of all, care has been taken that all these elements shall produce an impression of simplicity and naturalness.

Yet, as is the case with "The Lord of Burleigh," the balance between pathos and bathos is so even that the jarring of a single word would destroy the equilibrium; and we are not quite sure that the "Conclusion" altogether escapes this danger.2

(54) "THE LOTOS-EATERS." Two poems in the volume of 1833, "The Hesperides" and "The Lotos-Eaters," are related to "The Sea Fairies" of the former chapter. These two stand side by side; but eventually "The Hesperides" was withdrawn, and gave up some of its beauty to "The Lotos-Eaters"; gave, for example, the word "full-faced" from the following line:

"But when the full-faced sunset yellowly;"

for the line in "The Lotos-Eaters" "Full-faced above the valley stood the moon," read thus in the first edition—

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the "long dun wolds" of "Oriana." 2 See also pp. 54 and 98.

"Above the valley burned the golden moon." Besides these changes, the latter part of the more fortunate poem was re-written; and "The Hesperides" was rejected possibly on account of a few slight weaknesses, but more probably because its resemblances marred the single beauty of "The Lotos-Eaters."

That a poet should make alterations in his published work, even many times, is a matter partly 1 for admiration and advantage, partly for disapprobation and regret. In this respect of new editions, literary art stands almost alone. When we buy a picture that has been hung in the Royal Academy, we take it for granted that the painter has done with it. But masterpieces of literary art, sold as such, should not be subject to continued remodelling; for the purchaser may be inclined to murmur, "Your work was either ready for sale, or not; and if not, you might have kept it until it was; you were either deficient in some critical faculty, or you forced unfinished work upon the public and compelled them to buy over again." To this imaginary charge Tennyson has made himself much more liable than any other poet; and under this head it will be interesting to compare him with such other modern poets as Browning, Swinburne, Longfellow, Wm. Morris, M. Arnold, D. G. Rossetti.

But, to adopt the homely phrases of this argument, and twist it back upon itself a little, the lover of poetry who had the good fortune to buy "The Lotos-Eaters" of 1833 received full value for his money. "Nihil tetigit quod non ornavit" must be quoted once more as we write of Tennyson; but after this, few of us will greatly care to hear the familiar Latin again.

Three sonnets were mentioned a short time back, as possessing an excellence unknown to the sonnet before: this time it is the Spenserian stanza with whose murmuring

<sup>1</sup> See p. 167.

"She had lulled him fast asleepe That of no worldly thing he care did take,"

and to whose music:

"'Gan all the quire of birds Their diverse notes t' attune;"

but the five stanzas at the beginning of "The Lotos-Eaters" breathe a murmuring or a music more melodious even than Spenser's on The Idle Lake or in the Bowre of Blisse.

Very fine also is the musical effect of the closing section as it is found in the improved version. Tennyson had at least an ear for the music of verse; and the description of "the nerve-dissolving melody" in the second section of "The Vision of Sin" which may be compared with the section before mentioned, seems to show that the Laureate was more of a tone poet than we are sometimes disposed to admit.

The main subject of "The Lotos-Eaters" occurs in the "Odyssey;" a good deal has been suggested by Bion and Moschus, and in English literature, Spenser's "Fairy Queen" and Thomson's "Castle of Indolence" have furnished additional motive and material. Indeed so many poets are laid under contribution that the poem is almost "a posy of other men's flowers," and "little more than the string that binds them" is Tennyson's; but the bond is a cestus of no common magic.

It is impossible to speak of "The Lotos-Eaters," however briefly, without repeating what must be delightfully obvious to all, the skill with which the poet has placed his languid dreamers where earth, and heaven, and the sea, and the very gods themselves are one languid dream But in the self-indulgent repose of the Lotos Land the comrades of Ulysses were not permitted to linger:

τους μεν έγων έπι τημς άγον κλαίοντας ανάγκη .

this is the voice of Tennyson; and we shall soon hear in again in "Ulysses":

"How dull it is to pause, to make an end, To rust unburnished, not to shine in use, As tho' to breathe were life."

And thus, a moral emerges from this beautiful poem.

(56) "A DREAM OF FAIR WOMEN." Like "The Miller's Daughter," this poem was quite ruined by the pening lines since removed. Some of these must be repeated, because they tend to support a former opinion, hazarded in these pages, that the poet may sometimes build for himself a Palace of Art. The first two stanzas describe "a man that sails in a balloon;" they tell how he waves his flags to the mob below, from where his balloon "Glows ruby-like . . . . Filled with a finer air":

> "So, lifted high, the Poet at his will Lets the great world flit from him, seeing all, Higher thro' secret splendours mounting still, Selfpoised, nor fears to fall,

" Hearing apart the echoes of his fame, . . . "

Very interesting in their relation to the "Princess" are the following stanzas:

> " In every land I thought that, more or less, The stronger, sterner nature overbore The softer, uncontrolled by gentleness And selfish evermore:

"And whether there were any means whereby, In some far aftertime the gentler mind Might reassume its just and full degree Of rule among mankind."

The stanzas in the present edition, beginning, "The smell of violets" repeat a thought expressed in a very inferior song on page 142 of the 1833 volume :

> "Who can tell Why to smell The violet, recalls the dewy prime Of youth and buried time?"

Both passages are important, for though their violet does not bring back all the glory and the dream of Wordsworth "Pansy," 1 yet when read in conjunction with the last tw stanzas of the poem they are found to forecast the "year ings that can never be exprest" of "Tears, Idle Tears A great many improvements were made in the 18 version of this poem, the most notable being the lines:

"The bright death quiver'd at the victim's throat, Touch'd, and I knew no more,"

which are a very fortunate variation on the grotesque arlier reading:

"One drew a sharp knife thro' my tender throat Slowly—and nothing more."

The variation, as is so often the case, seems to find parallel in some former poet.<sup>2</sup>

"A Dream of Fair Women," besides being suggeste by Chaucer's "Legend of Good Women," bears a close resemblance to the Trionfi of Petrarch." Like "Tl Lotos-Eaters," it owes very much to other poets.

The poem, though often brilliant, has none of the naturalness of "The Miller's Daughter" or "The Ma Queen;" in style it most nearly resembles "The Palace Art," and gives an impression of stiffness. As yet, the only characters the poet has sketched without any show effort are those we met beside the mill-dam, or on the village green. These women in the "Dream," howeve are better drawn than the Adeline group; they gain by being historic, and they have dramatic touched Jephthah's daughter and Cleopatra are splendid painted, and made still more vivid by contrast and surroundings; Cleopatra especially is a portrait so striking and full of colour and of motion withal, that we find out selves convinced of the superiority of words to pigment in some departments of pictorial art.

<sup>1</sup> See Appendix to Chapter VII. 2 Sophocles, "Electra," 1305.

t may be added that the Fair Women whom the poet honoured in this highly-wrought poem are Helen of by, Iphigenia, Cleopatra, Jephthah's Daughter, Fair samond, Margaret Roper, daughter of Sir Thomas re, Joan of Arc, and Queen Eleanor. Cleopatra had cinated his imagination and made some of his best etry in "Poems by Two Brothers." Fair Rosamund l Eleanor play an important part in his "Becket."

61) "THE BLACKBIRD" was first published in 1842. the first edition the last stanza but one read as ows:

> "I better brook the drawling stares, Now thy flute-notes are changed to coarse-Not hearing thee at all, . . ."

e poet seems to have had his eye on the object while ting his verses; in spite of some blemishes they are sh and natural.

62) "THE DEATH OF THE OLD YEAR." This is the t poem but one in the volume of 1833.

It is just in Tennyson's early manner; remains unered, and contains nothing that is not his own; unless, it be not to consider too curiously, we faintly hear ong the verses the merriment and infinite jest of rick, and the quips of Hal with Falstaff, whose nose at ath was "as sharp as a pen" (stanzas 4 and 6). The pject has several times entered into Tennyson's poetry. ere it is treated with a pleasing fullness and picturesque-(62). "To J. S." These beautiful verses fitly closed published volume of 1833, which, as originally prered for the press, ended with "The Lover's Tale." J. S. the James Spedding who was one of Tennyson's circle Cambridge, and afterwards became a kindly reviewer of the poet's work. Until his death in 1881, Spedd continued to be one of the laureate's intimate friends.

This poem also remains nearly in its original for but with that remark our notice shall conclude. Tennyson's early poetry is open to a criticism both teresting and valuable; but the verses to J. S. seem sacred for scrutiny, whether intellectual or asthe There will be few enough among the readers of this be who have not felt the terrible inadequacy of words comfort the bereaved; and they will surely derive a colation from the thought that our great poet waddressed to his afflicted friend these stanzas, not quisite alone, but also most earnest in sympathy, sho yet exclaim, "Twere better I should cease."

(63). "ON A MOURNER" was first printed in 18 in the same volume that contained "Three Sonnets t Coquette." In this collection it naturally follows verses to J. S. There is some interesting study of natuumistakably Tennyson's, in the poem; and lofty thoug The figure and allusion in the last stanzas produce effect already noticed; in this case, however, emot seems to lose too much by the neutralizing close.

(64) "YOU ASK ME WHY, THO' ILL AT EASE," (64) "OLD SAT FREEDOM ON THE HEIGHTS," (64) "LOVE THE THY LAND," and (66) "THE GOOSE" did not appear 1842, though stated to have been written in 1833. ("ENGLAND AND AMERICA IN 1782" was first publish in the cabinet edition of 1874.

The five poems form a group devoted to political a social topics. Tennyson had little sympathy with reforms that were being effected, and sometimes we eager haste, during the years that followed close on 18 and he often cast an anxious glance across the narr as where raw haste was again proclaiming herself lf-sister to delay. The friend to whom the first poem addressed seems to have had less sympathy than the et with the great democratic movement of the age; ennyson will not forsake England unless a society that lls itself free shall happen to have made the individual bondslave.2 The stanzas are based on a speech of pedding's in the Cambridge Debating Hall in 1832.

The next poem, (64) "OF OLD SAT FREEDOM ON THE EIGHTS," expands two lines in the foregoing:

"Where Freedom slowly broadens down From precedent to precedent:"

nd in the history of Freedom a very important place is signed to Great Britain. The last two lines admirably scribe Tennyson in his office of moderator.

"God bless the narrow seas, I wish they were a whole Atlantic broad."

It will be convenient at this point to notice the charge brought against nnyson of remaining averse to the creed of Collectivism. The claims of individual to recognition are at no time less important than the similar ims put forward on behalf of the community. But the epoch of Tennyson nibits a tendency towards communistic or socialistic extremes; and again appears reasonable to admit that the laureate's neutral position was safest I best. That it was a fairly neutral one might be gathered from the htieth couplet of "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After: "

'When the schemes and all the systems, kingdoms and republics fall, Something kindlier, higher, holier-all for each and each for all," ough in such a passage as the following in "Merlin and Vivien," the indilual receives something less than his due-

" But work as vassal to the larger love That dwarfs the petty love of one for one."

The relative importance of individualism and collectivism is admirably ted in the following extract:

*Individuality, that is to say, conscience, applied alone, leads to anarchy; riety, that is to say, tradition, if it be not constantly interpreted and pelled upon the route of the future by the intuition of conscience, begets spotism and immobility. Truth is found at their point of intersection. It forbidden, then, to the individual to emancipate himself from the social ject which constitutes his task here below, and for bidden to society to crush tyrannize over the individual."-MAZZINI, Essays.

(64) "LOVE THOU THY LAND" is again an expans of the last two lines of the poem preceding, some of reflections being due to Spedding. It would be diffito find so much political and social good sense anywh else in literature. In one respect at least these verses worth all the writings of Burke; for while the old r easily look back to them with fond or bitter regret, young may as easily learn them by heart, and become nished not with opinions but, what is much more import with the best foundations on which to build up opinio Our age advances very rapidly, and the little poem written many years ago; but if all boys and girls be they left their teens could be brought to absorb its stanzas, we might look forward with more confidence the future.

(66) "ENGLAND AND AMERICA IN 1782" dates Eng freedom from Hampden. The third stanza in "Of sat Freedom," speaks of the "grave mother of maje works" as god-like in respect of dominion, and kingin respect of polity.

The real truth will be found in the fourth stanza of same poem, "The wisdom of a thousand years I them." Whatever measure of freedom England: possess, her people have achieved it; freedom is not ferred by a government nor even bought with the b of a patriot.

(66) "THE GOOSL" is a lively allegory of comm and free trade. "Alfred," said Fitzgerald, "cannot to ... His smile is rather a grim one." There is ju little truth in Fitzgerald's remark, and we may fairly ad that in "The Goose" the poet smiles grimly; but poem is much cleverer than anything else of the in the first two volumes.

We have now reached the last of the group headed The Lady of Shalott and other poems." It may be onvenient at this point to select from this group those ieces that were published, mostly in a much inferior orm, in the volume of 1833. They are the following:-The Lady of Shalott," "Mariana in the South," "The Iiller's Daughter," "Fatima" (as "O Love, Love, Love") Œnone," "The Sisters," "To -," "The Palace of rt,""The May Queen," "New Year's Eve," "The Lotos-Caters," "A Dream of Fair Women," "The Death of the old Year," "To J. S." To these must be added (from Juvenilia,") "Margaret," "Eleanore," "Rosalind," and our sonnets.

As the volume contained thirty pieces, there are yet everal not included in the foregoing list. Of these by ir the most important is "The Hesperides," a beautiful reation which has been noticed on p. 134. The following nes will be sufficient to show the many resemblances that nis poem bears to the "Lotos-Eaters."

"Father Hesper, Father Hesper, watch, watch, night and day, Lest the old wound of the world be healed

The glory unsealed,

The golden apple stol'n away,

And the ancient secret revealed.

Look from west to east along:

Father, old Himala weakens, Caucasus is bold and strong.

Wandering waters unto wandering waters call;

Let them clash together, foam and fall.

Out of watchings, out of wiles, Comes the bliss of secret smiles.

All things are not told to all.

Half-round the mantling night is drawn,

Purplefringed with even and dawn.

Hesper hateth Phosphor, evening hateth morn."

Another of the lady portraits, "Kate," has some merit, nd the lines "To Christopher North," otherwise Prossor Wilson, possess a personal interest. Wilson had tacked Tennyson and some of his friends in a critique the 1830 volume published in "Blackwood's Magazine" for May, 1832. Tennyson was sneered at as "the pet of a cockney coterie." The following is part of the poet reply:

"When I learnt from whom it came, I forgave you all the blame, Musty Christopher; I could not forgive the praise,

This is smart and amusing; but Tennyson was too great to make capital of any such bickerings; and although the last he never lost his extreme sensitiveness to criticism his future references to critics are usually more graceful, good-humoured or dignified.

One other poem in this volume of 1833 deserve mention, but not on account of its merit, for its weakne is phenomenal; one might almost say it was thrown among the other pieces as a morceau délicat for son hungry critic; and critics were often ravenous in tho days. The mere title of the three stanzas, "O Darlin Room," is a commentary in itself; we should like discover that the poem was of very early date, but strange to say, it was written on Tennyson's return fro the Continent in 1830.

" For I the Nonnenwerth have seen, And Oberwinter's vineyards green, Musical Lurlei; and between The hills to Bingen have I been, Bingen in Darmstadt, where the Rhene Curves towards Mentz, a woody scene. "Yet never did there meet my sight, In any town, to left or right, A little room so exquisite."

Besides the poems of the volumes of 1830 and 18 three pieces have to be noticed that were contributed "The Gem," a Literary Annual, in 1871. In the fit

"Anacreontics," the two lines

"And drooping daffodilly, are evidently the precursors of

"The vellow-leaved waterlily which we have seen in the first edition of "The Lady of Shalott." Otherwise the poem is not remarkable.

Much more interesting is "A Fragment." Though perhaps rather more Miltonic in style, it may be regarded is left over from "Timbuctoo." In its thirty-one lines we find the usual proportion of jewels re-set in after ears :

" Farsheening down the purple seas. . . . "

Broadbased amid the fleeting sands, and sloped Into the slumbrous summernoon."

" Awful Memnonian countenances calm Looking athwart the burning flats. . . . "

" Breathes low into the charmed ears of morn Clear melody flattering the crisped Nile."

The third of these pieces, a short lyric entitled "No More," will be found in the Appendix to Chapter VII.

In the same year, 1831, Tennyson contributed a sonnet, "Check every outdash, every ruder sally," to "The Engishman's Magazine" for August. In 1833 it was reprinted in "Friendship's Offering." As a sonnet it is not excellent, but it describes the valley where "first I told my love." The first three lines lend a sentiment to the Lotos eaters-

> " Speak low, and give up wholly Thy spirit to mild-minded melancholy," and in "The crisped waters whisper musically," we recognice some of the poet's favourite phrases.

In the year 1832 two souncts were published, "Mo my own five to lasting sorrow doometh," in "Friendship's Offering," and "There are three things which fill my heart with sighs," contributed to "The Yorkshire Literary Annual." The first of these, like the sonnet "Check every Outflash," seems to strike a personal note—

"But yet my lonely spirit follows thine;"

and the second reads like a reminiscence of the continental tour with Hallam—

"Of late such eyes looked at me—while I mused . . . In old Bayona nigh the southern-sea."

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER IV.

A SHORT ANALYSIS OF "THE TWO VOICES."

Stanza (1) Death is the only remedy for ill. (2) But am so wonderfully made. (3) So are dragon-flies. (6, 7 But man is better than they, (8-11) Man is not the highest life; and of men there are plenty better than you (12) Yet no two men are alike. (13, 14) But who wil miss you? (15) What hope of answer or redress? (16 17) Death is the only remedy for ill. (18, 19) I might de (20, 21) "So many worlds, so much to do, So little done such things to be!" (22-24) For all that you must die and know little of the wonder that will be. (25, 26) Ye -for one hour-I strive- (27-33) Truth will never be found—and least of all by you. (34) A selfish death i dishonour. (35-39) A loathsome life is worse. (40-52 Might I not do some good before I die? (53-67) Good intentions; but they fade with life away; and truth flie faster than men may follow. To die is best. (68-75 But some have done well. '76) It was mere chance 77-80 Death may be worse than life. 181-85 The dead are at rest. 89-105! Yet in that sleep of death what dreams may come. Our yearning for immortality is the one sure proof of immortality. 1100-111 Where were you before birth? To begin implies an end. 1112-128 Eternal process moving on, From state to state the spirit walks. (192) Mere dreams: your pain is real. (130-133) But you cannot tell me what death is, nor what might become of my soul. Not death but better life is the world's desire. (1341 "Behold, it is the Sabbath morn!" (135-154) "There's nothing we can call our own but love."

CHAPTER V.

THE VOLUME OF 1842, OR, "ENGLISH IDYLLS AND OTHER POEMS."

I. INTRODUCTORY. After the year 1833 no poetry was published by Tennyson until 1837, when he contributed the stanzas "O, that 'twere possible" to "The Tribute,' and "St. Agnes" to "The Keepsake." Again he kept silence until 1842. In that year his famous third volume was given to the public.

During this interval of nearly ten years he had not been idle. In a letter to Aubrey de Vere, Monckton Milnes writes: "Tennyson composes every day, but nothing will persuade him to print, or even write it down." The last statement must not be taken literally; part at least of "In Memoriam" was lovingly written and rewritten at intervals between the years 1833 and 1842 many of the earlier poems were re-cast; and by the end of the period the poet had prepared for the press the wonderful volume which is the subject of this chapter.

It was accompanied by a volume i. in two parts; the first containing a selection from the volume of 1830, and the second from that of 1833. The two parts are entitled, (I.) Poems (published 1830) and (II.) Poems (published 1832). At the end of Part II. the following note appears

"The second division of this volume was published in the winter of 1832. Some of the poems have been considerably altered. Others have been added, which, with one exception, were written in 1833."

Volume II., which contained the new pieces, is also entitled "Poems;" and the title of the two books together is, "Poems by Alfred Tennyson. In two volumes. London: Edward Moxon, Dover Street. MDCCCXLIII." The contents of the second or new volume are, "The Epic," "Morte D'Arthur," "The Gardener's Daughter," "Dora," "Audley Court," "Walking to the Mail," "St. Simeon Stylites," "The Talking Oak," "Love and Duty," "Ulysses," "Locksley Hall," "Godiva," "The Two Voices," "The Day-Dream," with its nine divisions, "Amphion," "St. Agnes' Eve" (the St. Agnes of 1837), "Sir Galahad," "Edward Gray," "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue," "Lady Clare," "The Lord of Burleigh," "Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinevere," "A Farewell," "The Beggar Maid," "The Vision of Sin," "The Skipping Rope," "Move eastward, happy earth, and leave," "Break, break, break," "The Poet's Song." At the end of the volume the following note occurs: "The Idyl of 'Dora' was partly suggested by one of Miss Mitford's pastorals; and the ballad of 'Lady Clare' by the novel

II. FIRST ASPECT OF THE VOLUME—"LOCKSLEY HALL" (98). Possibly nothing better could be chosen as suggesting the most remarkable characteristic of Tennyson's third volume of poems than the well-known passage in Shakespeare's "As You Like It"—

"Jaques. Yes, I have gained my experience.
Rosalind. And your experience makes you sad."

of 'Inheritance.'"

Shakespeare was probably about thirty-five when he wrote "As You Like It;" a little older when he created "Hamlet."

1 "You ask me why." . . . "Of old sat Freedom." . . . "Love thou thy land." . . . "The Goose."

Turning to "Locksley Hall," we find a very similar passage, although referred to the future:

" He bears a laden breast

Full of sad experience."

And there are many passages in the same poem, not so verbally alike, but of the same import, and pointed to the Judging from the date, 1842, Tennyson was about thirty-three when he wrote "Locksley Hall," and we may suppose he was some ten years older when he created the nameless hero of "Maud," that poem "slightly akin to "Hamlet." Like Shakespeare's Prince of Denmark, and this more modern Hamlet of Tennyson's "Maud," the disappointed lover in "Locksley Hall" finds that "the time is out of joint." 2

Now, although, as will be explained in the chapter on "Maud," the age of the Prince of Denmark seems to grow maturer, like his character, as he plays the tragedy through, yet an average estimate would make him only a little younger than the author of "Hamlet." In the same way " the hero of " Locksley Hall" is only a little younger than the author of "Locksley Hall." Amy, moreover, is something like Ophelia, in life but not in death. Maud slightly resembles Ophelia in life and in death.

"Locksley Hall," therefore, is Tennyson's "As You Like It," wherein another Jaques is the forerunner of another Hamlet. But Tennyson's poem includes many passages suggestive of Hamlet; let us, therefore, call it also "the first draft of 'Hamlet,'" and "Maud" the revised and enlarged tragedy.

1 See Chapter X.

3 See the first Appendix to this Chapter.

&quot; Locksley Hall," couplet 67. "Hamlet," I. v. 188. "Maud," I. i. 6. 3, q. And we are tempted to add, not one of the three seemed the sort of man "to set it right."

From this point of view "Locksley Hall" is the most important poem in the volume, and the one to be studied freet.

III. "Locksley Hall:" Subjective. The poem before us is a long soliloquy; one actor comes upon the stage, and pronounces one long speech; for the 1 Although the terms subjective and objective have become a little worn with usage, they are nevertheless convenient; and a few prefatory remarks may serve to explain their application to the subject of the present section.

We are sometimes too ready to believe that an artist must be altogether impersonal, objective; that he is a being indifferent towards his creations and apart from them; that the poet singer, for example, is "Not a whit

More in the secret than yourselves, who sit

Fresh-chapleted to listen."

As usual, the truth lies midway between two extremes. "Pectry," says John Stuart Mill, "is overheard." That is to say, the poet speaks to himself, or from the lips of his characters; his utterance is oracular, indirect; and those who would know the secrets of his heart must listen with a most sympathetic and long-accust med car; and they must listen to all he has to say.

To all; that is a very important point. He who would form an independent opinion of the personal element in any one poem or passage, must begin by knowing all that the writer has written. If possible, he should not miss a single line the poet has penned. He should examine verses impublished or withdrawn, for these have a peculiar power of casting light. He slow of the changes made in later editions; he should become familiar with the cets habit of expressing himself in any one dramate piece by carefully endving his other monologues, mono-dramas, and dramas: in short, as far as possible, he should know the whole work, and the man from his work. Hence he may expect to find that opinions vary, and that his own opinion will be subject to modification as he pare by bastidus year after year.

Of course some poets, Milton and Byron, for instance, are more personal than others; but none can be regard, but impersonal throughout. Shakes-speare's biography may be read in his works; or in a shorter form, by the aid of "A Mildsummer Night's Dream, "Hamlet," and "The Tempest," studied in connection with the Sonnets.

Vasan, some forms of paetry are more personal than ethers. In the canary lyric, the poet is expected to verif worth his own emition, in it and narrative he is a stery teller, but he may tell the story so as to regest something quite apart from it, on he may make on assonal telle tone of his own, or, even put them into the mouth of one of his characters, and this is true, though in a less degree, of the drama.

other characters, for plot, for change of scene, we have to trust, and often in vain, to his descriptions. What, for example, could be vaguer, more unlikely, more undramatic than the first and the seventy-third couplets of "Locksley Hall?" Tennyson calls such poems "Dramatic Monologues;" but is the one character a dramatic character at all? he is merely a portrait made to speak. The difference between such a character as he is represented, or as he represents himself, and the same character in drama proper, where he plays his part, is the difference between the portrait and the life. Character is developed or discovered only by contact with character, and life by the environment of life. As it is easier to draw the one character, the portrait, than to draw life, so Shakespeare in some of his earlier plays created only one character, and allowed the rest of the dramatis persona to remain puppets. For the same reason Tennyson's dramatic attempts are for many years limited to the monologue. He has called "Maud" a "monodrama;" it is strictly speaking a monologue. All that is added to the monologue is a lyrical scene-shifter,2 if we may so phrase it.

These monologues are peculiarly adapted to a subjective treatment. Through the lips of his one "character," who, to suit his purpose, will usually be overdrawn, the poet may safely utter his own more daring thoughts, his stronger emotions; and then, whenever convenient, he will call his character to correction.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The Princess" might to some appear an exception, but the question as to whether the story is told consistently will be discussed in Chapter VII.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Change of mood, as well as change of scene or incident, are often announced by a new lyric with a new form.

&lt;sup>3</sup> In drama proper, on the other hand, it is much more difficult for the writer to project himself into a character. Except in the temporary dramatic suspension of the soliloquy (and not then necessarily), so incessant is the action of each character on all the others, and so directed to subserve the dramatic issues, that any conscious madification of this action on the part of

In order to determine between the subjective and objective elements in such a poem as a monologue, we first ascertain the poet's general tendency by glancing at the whole of his work. In Tennyson's case the examination eads us to expect a personal motive. Then we ask, 'under what circumstances was the poem written? Is it accompanied by other poems having a similar motive?" For ten years Tennyson has been almost silent; "Much mas he thought, much suffered." We may therefore expect to find some poem standing in the same relation to his 1830 and 1833 volumes, as Shakespeare's "Hamlet" of "Love's Labour's Lost." He has lived long enough and sadly enough to begin to find fault with life.

Now we inquire of other pieces contemporary, or nearly so, with "Locksley Hall." To begin with, the first song n "Audley Court" is just another smaller "Locksley Hall." In "The Epic," the realm of religion is invaded by science, and there is a "general decay of faith Right through the world." In "Walking to the Mail," they that oved "At first like dove and dove were cat and dog"; the man, we are told, was "Vexed with a morbid devil in nis blood, That veil'd the world with jaundice" (we may note the same figure, "jaundice," in "Locksley Hall"); he had married, ten years before, the daughter of a cottager. And what was the result? she "sour'd To what she is." "Like breeds like, they say. Kind nature is the best" all this is in "Locksley Hall"). In the same poem is mention of "A Chartist pike"; "the raw mechanic's bloody thumbs" that "sweat on his blazon'd chairs:" of the "two parties"—"those that want and those that have," the author is destructive of dramatic effect. Drama then ceases to be an organic growth, actual life; it becomes merely a representation of life by means of painted bricks cunningly pieced together. Unconsciously to himself, nowever, as often in Shakespeare's case, the creator's intense and ruling emotion may be expressed in his creation as far as some one leading character is concerned.

<sup>1</sup> Letter of Margaret Fuller, August, 1842.

which "still divide the world"—"The same old sore To this we may add the six lines beginning "His nerves were wrong. What ails us who are sound."

"Edwin Morris" (printed in 1851) furnishes equal significant material,

"Something of a wayward modern mind Dissecting passion."

Our space does not permit fuller quotation; but tho who glance at the poem will discover another Opheli another Maud, who "Moved Like Proserpine in Emgathering flowers." And here we may quote from "Maud" "What is it he cannot buy"; for the lady is sold f £60,000, to "slight Sir Robert with his watery smile Trustees and aunts and uncles preach down the daughte heart.

"St. Simeon Stylites," though sufficiently objective, placed before us as a man who thought he found highest duty in forsaking his highest duty. Anoth poem—of which we scarcely dare to speak—"Love at Duty"—says of Duty, "O this world's curse." That du seemed to lie in sacrificing true love upon the altar untrue marriage, or, more exactly, an alien love on t altar of lawful marriage. "The Golden Year" printed 1840 despairs of "the feverous days." The better dato be are "not in our time, nor in our children's time And the poem concludes, as in "Locksley Hall," with plea for action in the present: "Howsoever these thin be . . I go." Ulysses moreover, when we meet within, is yearning "to seek a newer world."

It should here be stated in passing that there is lit of religion in "Locksley Hall" and in many of the oth poems that group themselves around it; that subject

<sup>1</sup> See "Mart," Part I. X. ii. Als reference to this passage on p. 16

<sup>3 &</sup>quot; Locksley Hall," 95 and 97.

ully dealt with in the desperate struggle between "The wo Voices"; also in "In Memoriam."

To resume the former running comment, we may next sotice that "The Day Dream" pleads with utility in behalf of beauty; and that in "Amphion" the poet asserts

"'Tis vain! in such a brassy age I could not move a thistle."

Possibly if "Will Waterproof" had been drinking water instead of port, we should have had a very different sketch of the times: even as it is, not everything looks rosy hrough the roseate wine. And just because the flagon that held a pint) is empty,

"With self at strife
I take myself to task," proceeding which is continued through some five stanzas.

The poem "To ——, after reading a Life and Letters" printed 1849), doubts whether the times are such as make he poet's name worth the winning. "Lady Clare" tells show Lord Ronald was rewarded for being true to true ove. "The Lord of Burleigh" likewise stooped, but he blayed true love false—just ever so little. "King Cophetua" was more fortunate with his beggar maid.

The lines, "Come not, when I am dead" (printed in 1851), grow in meaning if read with the following passage on which they appear to be based:

"Here lies a wretched corse: of wretched soul bereft!
Seek not my name: a plague consume you wicked caitiffs left!
Here lie I, Timon; who, alive, all living men did hate:

Pass by, and curse thy fill; but pass, and stay not here thy gait."

A somewhat similar sentiment finds expression in Shakespeare's sonnets. Over these Tennyson brooded often at this period, as we gather from "In Memoriam."

1 "Science grows, and Beauty dwindles."

Locksley Hall Sixty Years After

"The Vision of Sin" forms a fitting climax to this long array of poems that deal, most of them, and more or less directly, with the mystery of evil.

All the fore, any prems used to be regarded as belonging to the volume of 1842. They have therefore beer grouped together. "Freak, Break, Break, angle be added a but succed to the memory of Halland, a finds a place in the chapter on "In Memorian." The lonely melancholy of "A Farewell" may also be mentioned; it probably belongs to the year 1847, when "Leaving these, to pass away,

I think once more he seems to die."

In Memoriam, C. 5.

Gian ing not at other poons near enough in date to be regarded as a montpotary with the volume of 1842, we first notice the mournful and remarkable stances contributed by Temps in in 1837 to "The Tribute - A Collection of Miscellane as Unicoblished Poems by Various Authors." They are well known as being the nucleus of "Mand," and they are fully treated of in Chapter X.

"Tears, fille Tears" must next be mentioned; its tenderly recreated music flowing from the illimitable years, found a place in "The Princess" in 1847, but it was probably of earlier date. It is fully considered in the Appendix to Chapter VII.

Some short proms published a little later, a strictle and war-like, a verfauther evidence of influence excited by communicating events: as also do the subjects of war and particularly events: as also do the subjects of war and particularly events: Meanwhile, the questions to be chapter on "Mail." Meanwhile, the questions to be dealt with as at sing out of "Lo ksley Hall" are chiefly social. They appear again in the "Enid and Nimue" of 1851, the "Idvils of the King" of 1850, and the "Sea Dreams" of 1800. When we reach "Aviling's Field" of 1864, we hear the curse first pronounced in "Locksley Hall" upon "the social wants that sin against the strength of youth," repeated with terrible emphasis:

<sup>1 -</sup> Frank 1.45 - 1.56 -

"He believed
This filthy marriage-hindering Mammon made
The harlot of the cities: nature crost
Was mother of the foul adulteries
That saturate soul with body."

At "Aylmer's Field" we pause; it is the latest of the longer poems that have links with "Locksley Hall"; and to complete the list, we now add the earlier long poems of the period, "The Princess," "In Memoriam," "Maud." The four "Idylls" might well be cited in this connection; but we will leave them in the region of romance, and briefly show how closely the other four are related to "Locksley Hall." This must be done very generally; possibly by a single quotation. From "The Princess," for example, we might choose the very short passage "Ourselves are full Of social wrong." "In Memoriam" includes most of the topics of "Locksley Hall"; the quotation chosen shall be similar to that from "The Princess: " "Ring out old shapes of foul disease" (cv). As to "Maud," a just comparison between that poem and "Locksley Hall" would require a separate chapter. The poems are probably separated by a narrower space of years than the dates 1842 and 1855 seem to imply. Each ostensibly is a love story in which love is undone because the guardians of love have

"Two eyes for your banker, And one chilly glance for yourself;"

and in each poem the moody hero exclaims "Frailty, thy name is woman," and is then tempted to add, "Man delights me not, nor woman neither." Strange characters both, but for the fact that none could better play the part of mouthpiece for the poet. The lover in "Maud" als resembles the unheroic prince in "The Princess," who redeemed by love after terrible illness; loses, for example his "haunting sense of hollow shows," as the lover i "Maud" loses to some extent his "old hysterical mocl disease." But to return to "Locksley Hall" and "Maud There is the same outcry in each against almost exact the same social abuses: and the same distrust in Science though this is more decided in the later poem; there the same consideration 2 of the possible benefits of conmerce: of the more possible benefits of war; of patriotis as the moving spring of noble life. In each the lov motive is often overmastered by some other, such a patriotism, or war. In "Maud," for instance, as will I seen in Chapter X., although Maud looks down from th regions of her rest and cheers her lover, yet the con plete cure of the "disease" is left to a patriotic war; an very strange indeed is the effect of the close of the poer So in "Locksley Hall," the chief and the final hope noble life is contained in the two words, "I go," 3 to which we are bound to add, with your merry comrades; and, w may suppose, to fight somebody somewhere. But th most interesting comparison between Tennyson's fir and second "Hamlet" must not be carried further. remains to glance again at the fourth long poem, "Aylmer

LIBRARY ST. MARY'S COLLEGE

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Thanks, for the fiend best knows whether woman or man be the worse."

Mand, I. iv. 19.

Compare—

"There methinks would be enjoyment nore than in this march of mind, Locksley Hall, 83.

in the first we have only the expression of donkt; in the second of ironic conviction.

&quot; But these are the days of advance, the works of the men of mind;"

Mand, I. i. 7.

<sup>2</sup> Also in "The Princess," "Those two crowned twins. Commerce as Conquest,"

&quot;" Let it flame or fide" at the end of "Maud" corresponds exactly "Howsoever these things be" at the end of "Locksley Hall,"

Field": from which may be quoted a passage appropriate not only to the more important but also to the lesser of these many "poems of circumstance," as they might almost be called; in all of them we may fairly say that Tennyson

"Dash'd his angry heart
Against the desolations of the world." 1

And now, in the face of such overwhelming evidence, which will be considerably strengthened in the chapter on "Maud," we may reasonably conclude that the chief motive of "Locksley Hall" is to be found in that part of the subject matter which was contemporary; which had been accumulating for many years; which for many years had invaded and pervaded the poet's life; which found expression, more or less full and distinct, in almost all the poems he wrote at that period.

But what of the second "Locksley Hall"?—was that written under the same circumstances? Precisely, is our reply. It bears the same relation as the first "Locksley Hall" does to the time in which it was written, and the poems near to it in date. The fitting character could be created at any time; and in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," Tennyson gathered together the sadder topics of the day, the sombre reflections scattered among many contemporary poems, and then once more "Bore down in flood, and dash'd his angry heart Against the desolations of the world."

Whatever he may have been in actual life, Tennyson is seldom joyous in his poetry; there he thinks deeply, feels soberly, takes the time seriously.2

IV. "LOCKSLEY HALL," OBJECTIVE. At the risk of weakening our argument we place this inquiry in the second place, thus securing a fuller advantage to a generally received opinion. But to regard "Locksley Hall"

1 "Aylmer's Field," 633, 634.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;His also habitual gaze at life in its deeper aspects, which else would almost have overwhelmed him with awe."—Mr. Knowles of Tennyson.

as a work of impersonal art is exceedingly difficult; the subjective motive cannot be lost sight of long together. Nor can we view it aright under this head without in cluding within our range of vision the companion poems "Maud," "Aylmer's Field," "Locksley Hall Sixty Year After." It will be best to sketch the story first, and the examine the leading characters.

It is a well-known story, as noticed in the forme section; it is told by Tennyson several times over. It finds a place, though with a difference, even in "Locksle Hall Sixty Years After":

"Jilted for a wealthier! wealthier?"

A man and woman have known each other perhapsince they were boy and girl together. The result is love. The currents of their being flow on in one fair strong stream. But as long ago as Shakespeare's time,

"The course of true love never did run smooth,
But, either it was different in blood . . .
Or else it stood upon the choice of friends."

*Midsummer Night's Dream, I. i. 134.

A "choice" determined by a too eager regard for gold, and a too light regard for the intensest and the holiest emotion of human life. If the girl is weak, she forsakes her lover and marries a fortune; if she strong, she remains true, and dies; and this with more cless of heroism; for often the fashion of it looks clanded tine in a day like ours.

Such, in brief, is the story of "Maud," "Aylmer's Field "Locksley Hall," and some other poems near the date

1 Was Amy so much to blame! "Amy loved me, Amy fail'd me; Amwas a timid child."

"These had been together from the first;
They might have been together till the last."

Aylmer's Field, 713, 714.

This is the tale as told by "Mand," "Locksley Hall," and "Aylme Each!" There is no such paths of relation between the lovers in "To Gardener's Daughter."

The subject, however, as introduced into "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" is different; the woman is not weak, but vicious, "A worldling, born of worldlings."

"She that holds the diamond necklace dearer than the golden ring" (11).

In this later poem, moreover, the lover is said to be "of easier, earthlier make."

Our brief consideration of the theme as such has now brought us to the border of the former section, for the fact that the poet tells the story with a purpose more conscious than a mere art motive, is here again forced upon us, first from the frequency with which he tells it, and next, because the moral of "marriage-hindering mammon" may always be read in some irrelevant passage.

In "Locksley Hall" and "Maud" a remedy is proposed for wounded love; in the former it is a prospect of progress due mostly to science; in "Maud," where the poet's faith in science has been shaken, it lies in the energizing of a nation by war. In "The Princess," we may add, which dates between the two, while again, in "In Memoriam," science fills the poet with a doubt:

"The sport half-science, fill me with a faith . . ."

"A higher hand must make her mild If all be not in vain."

In "Aylmer's Field" the poet's best hope seems to be expressed by the saying "marriages are made in Heaven."1

And lastly, in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," no hope is left in science or commerce; none is suggested by war; none by the present anywhere, except in a goodness itself exceptional; what other hope there may be is withholden in the future.

From the story we turn to the characters; as a general statement at the outset, we may say that most of them spoil the story. "Locksley Hall" and "Maud" contains some of the finest poetry ever written about early love and in each poem love is slain by the very hero himself. The poet who could write:

"First love, first friendship, equal powers That marry with the virgin heart" would hardly do fair justice to "first love;" his lovers are extravagant; those they love are disappointing. The hero of "Locksley Hall" stultifies his position; he is the sport of moods which "vary Mostly for the worse":

"The fires of youth, the follies, furies, curses, passionate tears." 1

The moods of Maud's lover vary yet more for the worse One has hardly the patience to point them out. As to "Aylmer's Field," the lover there does not make himself a lunatic; and why? simply because his brother acted as Tennyson's spokesman, and spoke to the extent of some hundred and fifty lines, and spoke pretty plainly. That is just the difference: in "Aylmer's Field "the poet has no motive for making the lover a caricature. We look on to "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After:" in this poem as in "Locksley Hall" and "Maud", there is only the one character through whom the poet may find utter ance for impatient long-pent emotion, and therefore that character is again a caricature.

Tennyson, say some, allowed the lover to rave an exaggerate in "Locksley Hall," in order that he migh represent him in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" as man whom time had made wiser, kinder, and mor worthy to be loved. But surely Time, the physician never had a more unsatisfactory patient; it would be much easier to show that sixty years had made Amy lover sixty years older and not a year wiser.\(^1\) Certainly he does caution his grandson in reference to the past.\(^2\) "Youthful jealousy is a liar,\(^2\) but of himself in that present he confesses,\(^4\)

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" (20)

"Heated am I? you - you wonder -well, it scarce becomes mine age -Patience! let the dying actor wouth his last upon the stage."

"Cries of unprogressive dotage ere the dotard fall asleep."

Lovers of Tennyson take not so much exception at the cries of the dotard; but they bear it ill that two of the otherwise most entrancing love poems in our literature, "Locksley Hall" and "Maud," should be made to ring false because of the unaccountable moodiness of the lover, a moodiness—and here again we return to the former section—that after all is accountable when we regard the character as an exponent of the poet's own opinions.

The lover in "Locksley Hall" is inclined to believe 2 that "woman is the lesser man"— "Here, at least, where nature sickens, nothing;" and a contemporary poem speaks of the "Wayward modern mind, Dissecting passion." The first of these doctrines, we are sure, is not entirely Tennyson's own; the second, he entirely condemns:

"Your modern amourist is of easier, earthlier make."

For he held by an older doctrine, and himself could look back upon the time 3

"When passion first walled a new life through his frame."

Then why did he not leave us at this maturer period a poem of young love at once passionate and sane? Because he was so engrossed with his Hamlets.4

<sup>2</sup> Couplets 75, 76, 77.

3 As in the sonnet "Check every outflash . . . " (p. 145).

&lt;sup>1</sup> Edith, to whom the work of redemption was left enjountly with Time,— "Nesseof alling body, and mind" (Couplet (x)) does not seem to have been much more successful.

The Gardener Daughter and the new version of The Milla's

But Shakespeare, who was dowered with the love of this love, left us more than one such poem. And it is curious that his notable play without a heroine is the play that passionately idealizes a friend. Just for a little he lost his faith in woman; he forsook Ophelia for Horatic; but he never did it again. And from Romeo and Juliet to Ferdinand and Miranda, what lovelier pictures were ever drawn of love? Let us be tremblingly thankful that love—this love—was made immortal by Shakespeare.

V. CONCLUSION. Although Tennyson must seem to have spoilt the impression of these three monologues, "Maud" and the two "Locksley Hall's," by too much suspicion of motive, they are nevertheless remarkable poems. And although he does not say enough about the good that is brought forth of evil, and seems sometimes to forget his own maxim,

"It is better to fight for the good than to rail at the ill," yet there is left in them enough of wisdom and beauty to charm us into grateful admiration. Nor does the leading character in "Locksley Hall" lose altogether his individuality or his attractiveness. He is young enough to have a future before him, and buoyant enough to have some belief in it. To praise the poem in detail would be impossible here, even if fifty years of praise had not made praise something like presumption. It will be enough to say that "Locksley Hall" is one of Tennyson's greatest Daughter" might at first seem exceptions: yet these give not the passion of young love, but merely recollections of love in age. "Love and Dury" is a mystery; "The Talking Oak" a lovely trifle. Further, it is a very notable fact that in all these poems the speaker is a man; and further, as will be seen in "The Princess," the man's attitude is always patronising—never naturally passionate. Hence also Tennyson's women are never heroic like Shakespeare's.

1 We do not forget our gratitude to Tennyson for the love he made immortal; the love of a friend in "In Memoriam," and in "Rizpah" the love of a mother.

successes; one of the most original, most fascinating, most popular short poems of our time.

It was a poetical surprise and delight, one of those fortunate poems that everybody reads, and concerning which some one tells you with enthusiasm, "I shall never forget the first time I read it." Of these "fortunate" poems Tennyson has written a remarkable number. Shakespeare and Milton in our literature, and some five or six masters of song in other literatures are of course excepted when we make the assertion that it is impossible for any man, reader or critic, to keep fairly in mind the beauty, originality, variety, and extent of the poetic treasures bequeathed to his fellow millions by this one poet. The maker of a book about Tennyson may be pardoned if now and then he puts aside the weights and measures of judgment, and pauses merely to admire.

VI. OTHER ASPECTS OF THE VOLUME OF 1842. THE REMAINING POEMS:—The later explanatory title, "English Idylls and Other Poems," points to a second important characteristic of the volume of 1842. The term "idyll," which is so largely employed by Tennyson, meant in the original Greek, "little picture." In the sense of little pictures of life it was applied to the bucolic and love poetry of Theocritus, which deals chiefly with the life of shepherds, and mostly uses pastoral scenery for the background of the picture. This poetry, which was essentially natural, found many imitators, such as Virgil. It then lost its naturalness, admitted political, moral and philosophical elements; and in the hands of many English writers of pastoral verse became an insipid jingle of artifice and convention.

The modern idyll seeks chiefly to expel artifice and restore nature. Southey, accepting a hint from the German idylls, wrote eight eclogues, which may be regarded as the precursors of Tennyson's idyllic poems. Some of Crabbe's tales are idyllic, as also are some of Wordsworth's. Tennyson, however, has widely extended the province of the idyll, so that it includes such various compositions as the "small sweet Idyl" of "The Princess," and the epical series of Arthurian poems.

One definition of the term "idyll" will be found on p. 201; and the following may serve as another; but a precise definition of this form of poetry in Tennyson seems impossible: —"An idyll is a picture in verse of the simpler, purer, and more natural life that is always associated with the country; and the scenes amid which that life is laid will interpret and harmonise with its emotions."

Such are most of the idylls in this volume; and we may therefore expect a certain number of poems developing in various directions the type already introduced in "The Miller's Daughter"; poems of modern English life, fresh, simple, and of pure affection; and made one with everything that is beautiful in nature. Of these the best example is "The Gardener's Daughter."

Modern English life is also represented in poetry of a conversational half-idyllic character, such as "Edwin Morris" and "Walking to the Mail." These pieces are strikingly novel. In "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue" Tennyson's fine faculty of humour appears for the first time; and in "Morte d'Arthur," the book further affords an earnest of the Arthurian idylls.

This volume of 1842, containing as it did so much that was new and at the same time magnificent, easily established Tennyson's position as a poet of a very high order. Moreover, although most of the poems were to undergo a good deal of revision, they were on the whole much more highly finished than those of the former volumes: and, what was also important, with the exception of "The Skipping Rope," they offered little that could provoke hostile criticism.

Finally, the poet had profited greatly by criticism and by ten years of toil; in the new poems the mannerisms that were so painfully abundant in the two earlier volumes become less frequent, and in some cases disappear altogether; there is less straining after effect, and more of the serious business of poetry; melody does not so often attempt to free itself from matter; the whole volume is pervaded by yet higher refinement, truth, seriousness, nobleness; and, to return to the former section of this chapter, if Tennyson's experience has made him sad, it has also made him a greater poet.

Nor must another important cause of his somewhat sudden renown be forgotten; it has already been remarked that the volumes of 1830 and 1833 which now reappeared as "Volume I.," were increased in value threefold. But to measure poetic value in any such definite way is not enough; it would be easier and probably truer to say that the revised edition of the earlier poems was almost as new and remarkable as the additional volume of 1842.

Three volumes, therefore, we might almost say, were now sent forth at once: and with these Tennyson could challenge all or most of the poets his contemporaries, among whom, though some had almost ceased to write, were redoubtable names, such as Wordsworth; and the following list of possible competitors, formidable or otherwise, is not uninteresting: –Southey, Landor, Leigh Hunt, Monckton Milnes, Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, Lytton, Sir H. Taylor, Mackay, P. J. Bailey, Sterling, Hood, Campbell, Ruskin.

(67) "THE EPIC,"—(68) "MORTE D'ARTHUR" (see "Idylls of the King," Chapter XI.).

(72) "THE GARDENER'S DAUGHTER; OR, THE PICTURES."—The second of these titles seems to suggest the motive of the poem. The subject of the idyll is "A Rose in Roses;" that is to say, the poet wants to paint a beautiful woman in suggestive and equally beautiful surroundings. Compared with what he intends to accomplish now, his former sketches, with one or two exceptions, are a mere jingle of words; among the exceptions are The Miller's Daughter, Aphrodite, and Cleopatra. Further, the whole picture as in "The Miller's Daughter," is to be suffused with the glow of young love. What story will suit? it must be of the slenderest, for he intends to paint rather than articulate; then he had better borrow incidents from actual painting, and thus disguise his intent, or draw a parallel to it. Hence the pictures; hence the artist story-teller, for he may enlarge the pictorial element as he proceeds; hence, as a further disguise, the second artist, who paints his pictures also. But the story is a little improbable, and after all too evidently a makeshift; yet, in its kind, this poetry is matchless. We have a picture, let us say, rather than a poem; modern poets have often succeeded in expressing emotion, too subtle for definite thought, by a kind of word-music; here, instead of articulate emotion we have word-painting. Naturally, therefore, rhyme or quick movement will be out of place where a pictorial effect is aimed at: it is too obviously musical; and we have stately blank verse accordingly.

But the poem has other perfections, and too numerous to mention; it has also some of the faults with which we are familiar; and other poets are laid under contribution much as in the earlier volumes. Of these the chief is Milton. For example, "Paradise Lost," iv. 268-270;

"That fair field Of Enna, where Proserpine gathering flowers, Herself a fairer flower..."

may be compared with "A Rose in Roses." That the passage was in Tennyson's thoughts might be seen from another imitation in "Edwin Morris," "Like Proserpine in Enna gathering flowers." "Leaves that tremble round a nightingale," would be Milton's "Airs, vernal airs, Attune the trembling leaves." While under the spell of such beauty as lives in every line of "The Gardener's Daughter," we do wisely to remember the yet more abundant and more enchanting beauties of "Paradise Lost."

(77) "DORA."—Tennyson's bent is towards simplicity; yet his worst faults appear in his simpler styles. His chief weakness is weakness; 2 and this weakness will naturally assert itself in such simple poems as "Dora," where selfconsciousness of manner has not been altogether refined away. "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" has twice the strength and much of the beauty of "Locksley Hall"; "The Ancient Sage" is worth a score of "Two Voices"; "Lucretius" can rival "Tithonus" and more than rival "Enoch Arden"; and a stanza of "Rizpah" might to some seem a fair exchange for "Dora." "Dora" is a kind of poem about which we might say, that had the poet written that one only, it would have given us a different impression; the author of "Dora," and not Wordsworth only, would have exposed himself to the amusing mimicry of the brothers Smith-

"Papa (he's my papa and Jack's) Bought me, last week, a doll of wax,
And brother Jack a top. . . ."

"I saw them go; one horse was blind, The tails of both hung down behind, Their shoes were on their feet."

The opening lines of "Dora," for example, read without context, might seem to hold bathos at bay; but, looked

1 The famous comparison,

"That hair

More black than ashbuds in the front of March," may seem more novel than exact. The ashbuds that adorn the brow or the early part of March, have a rusty and dusty brown-black appearance, which is more noticeable by comparison with Swinburne's figure for a lady shair—at more closely, and in connection with the rest of the poem, they are assuredly weak. To begin with, the repetition of any one set device in such a poem is enough to turn the scale. "With Farmer Allan at the farm abode William and Dora. William was his son,"-is good enough; but towards the close we have, "And for three hours he sobb'd o'er William's child, Thinking of William." This reminds us too clearly of "farm" and "William," both repeated in the former passage. Again, the word "abode" is used a second time, perhaps intentionally, at the close; but it is too special in its use, too biblical to bear such repetition. This judgment comes of a more general view: "yearned towards" in the first half-dozen lines is excessively biblical, as also is, "Then the old man was wroth," a few lines further on. To the remarks made upon the close of the poem may now be added a reference to the over-studied metrical prose of the last four lines. As to the repeated line, "And the sun fell, and all the land was dark," it would be majestic in its beauty in the "Idylls of the King;" here its strain is of a mood much too high. If now we view these particulars (which might be increased almost indefinitely), as they appear in the poem as a whole, we are sensible that the style has not grown naturally out of the subject; it is not what expression is to the features; it is not as the spirit that irradiates the form.

&quot;Clear now as the plume of a bright black bird."

<sup>2</sup> Page 53.

The faults of "The Gardener's Daughter" were altogether different; that was a much better poem; weakness was rarely apparent; there was a multitude of filed phrases that had been used before by the author, or would be used again; some slight excess of natural description over motive and impulse—in other words, the poem was at times rather too objective to be the work of an artist in words; and there was perhaps an unnecessary quantity of borrowed ornament. But the effort was as highly successful as it was novel.

"Dora," as Tennyson informs us, was "partly sugrested" by "The Tale of Dora Creswell," in Miss Mitford's "Our Village." One characteristic of the erse would be anticipated by a consideration of its imple style; there is a very large proportion of monoyllables; moreover the imagery is as plain as the style; nd the vocabulary is essentially English.

(79) "AUDLEY COURT." This idyll of plain modern English life is both new and excellent. The story may be partly if not wholly a means of introducing the songs, specially when we remember the two songs in "The Princess" that were sung at a picnic. For these songs ere something almost if not quite new; they are blank erse made fairly lyrical—to be made charmingly lyrical n later volumes.3 Already the second of the two anticipates the "Swallow Song" in "The Princess." At the end is another well-known Tennysonian close, followng and making appropriate a bit of description othervise somewhat long, somewhat too emotional, but, as it stands, real, admirable, beautiful. Exactly the same levice may be noticed at the end of "The Princess," where a yet more highly-coloured description is toned lown by three matter-of-fact lines and their concluding 'home well-pleased we went." And, generally, it will be noticed that in all these idylls a perfect correspondence is preserved between the subject, and the scenery and magery that adorns it. Many of the figures in this poem are plain but fresh, and "breathing of the sea." "Sharper than an eastern wind;" "as a thorn Turns from the sea;" "The pilot of the darkness and the dream;" "the cliffs that guard my native land;" "I might as well have traced it in the sands;" "the sea wastes all."

<sup>1</sup> See also p. 153. 2 Viz., "Tears, idle Tears," by Violet, and "The Swallow Song," by the Prince, Canto IV.

(81) "WALKING TO THE MAIL." This is another Idyll, conversational or half-dramatic in form, which brings us close perhaps too close --to modern ordinary English life. The humour is a little broad, as might be expected between characters who are recollecting schoo or college days, when one of them was "As cruel as a school boy."

To the motive of the poem some reference is made or p. 153; it may be discovered partly in the line that contains words in italics, "He left his wife behind;" also "That was the last drop in the cup of gall." In other words, the poet deals first with unhappier relations between husband and wife than those of the Lord of Burleigh; next, with "the same old sore" that "breaks our from age to age." At the close we note the reversior from earnest moralizing to "three pyebalds and a roan."

(83) "EDWIN MORRIS; OR, THE LAKE" was firs published in the seventh edition of Poems, 1851. In thirdyll, as befits the occasion, the theme of "Locksley Hall" receives lighter—perhaps happier—treatment:

"She seems a part of those fresh days to me."

Again we have a poem quite new in every particular and a pleasant addition it is to the stores of Englis poetry. Nothing very powerful or grand, perhaps, but-and so are they all -a wonder of minute beauty, fin imagination, wise thought, perfection of form. As, writin these notes, we turn the pages over to glance for th hundredth time at this succession of pieces original an matchless of their kind, we become almost bewildered at the "full cell'd honeycomb of eloquence Stored from a flowers;" especially when we remind ourselves that they are yet to be noticed "The Talking Oak," "Love an Duty," "Ulysses," "Tithonus," and many more. Fro its slight poem alone what a selection of apt or charmg quotations might be made! what vividness of gestureainting, for example, in the lines, "Again with hands of ild rejection—Go!" but to begin quoting is easier than be end; our attention, as often, must be limited to the lose of the poem; not intentionally commonplace this me; for the last three lines sketch the returning spring nd summer that bring back little Letty; only three lines, et the enchantment of spring 1 and the light and colour nd warmth and slumbrous beauty of summer are in nem; and they do not contain one among the many nousands of hackneyed expressions which the average oet must make use of when describing those seasons.

<sup>1</sup> See also p. 154.

Everything in the three lines is new, or newly put, and not with ravishing effect.

(85) "ST. SIMEON STYLITES." "A man's charity is in proportion to his knowledge; the greater knowledge, the reater charity." Therefore when Tennyson paints for all ime such types of mediaval religion as St. Simeon of he pillar, St. Agnes, Sir Galahad, and the rest, he will do t with some sympathy of charity. "Thou wilt not gash hy flesh for him," says the preacher in "Aylmer's Field;" 'for thine Fares richly, in fine linen." Macaulay says somewhere, "It made them a sect; it left them a faction." Even the ways of doing God service will change with the times; and what is at first a virtue may at the last become a ridiculous form. The days have been when men who would worship must flee into the desert; the world has been so lustful that he who would save his soul from his body must triumph over his body altogether; and St. Simeon on his pillar not only drew safely nearer to his God, but also was lifted up before men who could learn self-sacrifice and holiness in no other way. Certainly Tennyson makes a poem out of the situation; but not quite as the Soul in the "Palace of Art" turns to a vain and selfish æsthetic account whatever the past had treasured of nobleness, faith, truth, beauty, and love. He does three things: as an artist, he sets before us an idea representative of this class of ascetics; as a moralist, he makes clear to us their mistakes; as a wise man, he makes us feel kindly disposed towards them, even as he almost certainly does himself.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Prime" recalls Milton's line

&quot;The season, prime for sweetest scents and airs."

"St. Simeon Stylites" will be found in Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" in those pages he meets with no sympathy. The poem is a very clever intellectual study; that is its chief art, and from that we must derive our chief pleasure.1

(88) "THE TALKING OAK." Spite of Goldsmith's "Edwin and Angelina," and many other poems in which this ballad stanza could not be regarded as a complete success, Tennyson was determined to try its qualities and, as usual, was completely successful.

The poem itself is one of the most delightful in the volume; dainty, graceful, and intensely English. The well-known figure, "The flower she touch'd on," is not quite like Scott's

"E'en the slight harebell raised its head Elastic, from her airy tread," for it is a "pathetic fallacy;" and as such is appropriate enough in a poem about a "Talking Oak." 2

Those who know Tennyson as a metrist would expect

I At the same time, it may be questioned whether such poetry is of a very high order. Let prose remain the recognized medium for expressing in tellectual thought, and let what we prize most in poetry still be music, picture emotion, imagination. Or, if extremes are being dealt with, let us not be blamed if, from the two forms of poetic excess, we choose a "harmoniou-dance of words upon the brink of nonsense," before the rigid verses of un adorned reason.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See also footnote, p. 78.

that in a poem of this length, some variations would be introduced in the rhythm of the short-lined and rather rigid stanza; and such is the fact. "Like a golden butterfly," "The berried briony fold," are among the most important, and they are more daring than usual. As an example of condensed poetical material drawn from the past, we would select "All starry culmination drop Balmetews." This, unravelled, would make some half-dozen lines of prose. The figure, or part of it, occurs very frequently in Tennyson's poetry: "And balmy drops in summer dark Slide from the bosom of the stars."

(92) "LOVE AND DUTY." (See also p. 154.) This poem seems to call for a good deal of criticism. Did the poet choose the subject as he chose the fragment of "Sappho" (p. 123), merely to exercise himself in the utterance of passionate love; or was the subject prescribed for him?

In either case the sentiment rings false. Among the many hard sayings of the Bible there is one to the effect that the man who has lawfully bound himself to one woman, and therewithal dwells fondly in his thought on another woman, is disloyal to the first. In other poets—especially if modern—the discrepancy might not be striking; but one of Tennyson's greatest poems, the "Idylls of the King," tells how a kingdom fell in ruins because of the violation of the injunction "To love one only, and to cleave to her." And this doctrine, as will presently be seen, is maintained in all his other poems that deal with the relations between men and women. The subject is treated more fully in the notes on "The Wreck."

But apart from this moral aspect of the situation, how condescending is the attitude assumed by the man; he will take care of himself in his own way, but the woman is to do what he tells her, which amounts to little more than a vague looking forward.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," xvii,

The poem bears some resemblance to the "Farewell to Nancy" of Burns. Browning in "Evelyn Hope" and Swinburne in "The Triumph of Time," without contravening the most exacting morality, work out, each after his own method, a problem of love unfulfilled. In Tennyson's poem, if the words "behold thy bride" are not to be taken in their usual sense, the passion exhibited grows out of all proportion to motive. It will perhaps be best to abandon this part of the subject as a problem not worked out, merely adding from "The Gardener's Daughter" a short quotation which seems appropriate to any possible solution.

"Not easily forgiven
Are those, who, setting wide the doors that bar
The secret bridal chambers of the heart
Let in the day."

Again, as regards the form of the poem, although the work is splendid, it loses a little from the obtrusiveness of borrowed beauty.

Once more, the last few lines may be chosen for comment—four of them. The effect, as ever, is very fine: emotion dies away into the loveliness of great nature. And the material employed is exquisitely managed; but it is not so new as in the passage at the end of "Edwir Morris." There we found the classical variant "Then while;" here it is the more familiar and less poetica "Then when." But some further important remarks under this head will be reserved for a second appendix to the present chapter.

(94) "THE GOLDEN YEAR." In this admirable poem which was first published in the Fourth Edition of "Poems," 1846, the poet has much to say on his own account. As an Idyll, it is conversational, like "Edwin Morris," "Audley Court," and "Walking to the Mail," and like these contains much wisdom and sound sense, flavoured with a little dry humour. The lesson we learn from "The Golden Year" is an important one in any age; and in every age it has found some one to teach it; but no age should know it so thoroughly as our own. "Act, act in the living present," has become one of the religions of the nineteenth century. Yet no one looks back upon the past with dearer regret than Tennyson; and none more yearningly towards the future. He does both in this poem; and then, for his own behoof as well as for the advantage of the world at large, he sets old James in our midst:

"What stuff is this!
Old writers pushed the happy season back,—
The more fools they,—we forward: dreamers both."

The passage, "Shall eagles not be eagles, wrens be wrens?" may be partly explained by Richard III. i. 69-72:

"The world is grown so bad That wrens make prey where eagles dare not perch: Since every Jack became a gentleman, There's many a gentle person made a Jack."

(95) ULYSSES. According to the poet and the friends of the poet, "Ulysses" is a portrait of Tennyson; but there were many Tennysons, or at least two; and a better likeness of the author of "Far-far-away" will be found in "Tears, Idle Tears." Those two poems come straight from the heart; the others, such as "Ulysses," may be "drawn from the spirit through the brain." If Ulysses is a "gray spirit yearning in desire To follow knowledge," we also have it on the poet's own authority that "Tears, talle Tears" was written to express yearnings for the past. "Ulysses" fitly follows "The Golden Year," and affords a striking contrast to "The Lotos-Eaters." The modernized Greek "works, and feels he works."

This is a noble poem in conception and in execution, although its Ulysses is no more that ancient King of Ithaca than the Arthur of the idylls is King of Britain. Of the earlier Ulysses a dim legend may be read in Homer, and hints gained from Virgil and Horace; and these poets are represented in Tennyson's verse. But the more modern figure has taken shape in Dante's "Inferno" (xxvi. 94-126), and to Dante Tennyson stands most indebted. The blank verse of the poem is admirably adapted to the character "Strong in will To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

(96) "TITHONUS." How different is the soft sweet plaintive rise and fall, line after line, of the music of this infinite mournfulness—

"Immortal age beside immortal youth."

In manner, this exquisite poem resembles the soliloquies in such Greek plays as those of Sophocles. "Ulysses" was a striking sketch of character; in "Tithonus" we have rather the study of an emotion and its circumstances. The subject is found in the Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite, and it is splendidly treated by Tennyson; nor will we mar his perfect work by detaching any portion for comment. Only a few incidental notes are added. In the setting of this classic theme the poet occasionally uses classic material: "The gods themselves cannot recall their gifts" may be supplied by the poet Agathon as quoted by Aristotle:

μόνου γὰρ αὐτοῦ καὶ θεὸς στερίσκεται, ἀγένητα ποιεῖν ἄσσ' ἃν ἢ πεπραγμένα,

"While Ilion like a mist rose into towers":—This mist in "(Enone" is "a cloud that gathered shape": and in Milton—to be imitated afterwards by Pope—

"Anon out of the earth a fabric huge Rose like an exhalation." The legend, without the mist, is in two lines of Ovid:

"Ilion aspicies, firmataque turribus altis Mœnia, Phœbeæ structa canore lyræ."

And in "Gareth and Lynette" the city of Camelot was built "to the music of their harps."

As the poem is perhaps the most perfect specimen of poetic workmanship in all Tennyson, it may be supposed to be a product of his maturest period; and in fact "Tithonus" was not published until 1860, when it appeared in the "Cornhill Magazine" for February of that year. Very slight alterations have been made; the first line originally read, "Ay me, ay me, the woods decay and fall," a Tennysonian weakness that would have seriously impaired the poem, especially as the exclamatory phrases occur again in line 50.

(103) "GODIVA." The story is famous, and English, and one often told, yet not altogether a pleasant one. Sir William Dugdale ("Antiquities of Warwickshire," 1656) dates it about 1057: and he gives a full account of Godiva's heroism, and of the baseness and prompt punishment of Peeping Tom of Coventry. Drayton also in his "Polyolbion" (1613, 1622) gives the legend at full length. Moultrie and Leigh Hunt both made it the subject of a poem, and both their poems should be compared with Tennyson's "Godiva." Elizabeth Barrett is said to have preferred Leigh Hunt's version to Tennyson's.

The poem has remained unaltered. The blank verse is in the poet's best idyllic manner; the local colouring is the chief merit of the piece. "His beard a foot before him, and his hair A yard behind," "Then fillipp'd at the diamond in her ear," "He parted, with great strides among his dogs," "Like a summer moon, Half dipt in cloud," "And all the low wind hardly breath'd for fear,"

"The little wide-mouthed heads upon the spout,"-all these and many more adorn a well-told story.

(104) "THE DAY DREAM." "Such is this elegant and commonsense society, refined in comfort, regular in conduct, whose dilettante tastes and moral principles confine it within a sort of flowery border." Having sketched our modern English society in these words, amongst others, M. Taine proceeds to take the measure of its favourite poet and of his poetry; "Does any poet suit such a society better than Tennyson. . . . The ladies have been charmed by his portraits of women; they are so exquisite and pure . . . His poetry is like one of those gilt and painted stands in which flowers of the country and exotics mingle in artful harmony. . . . It seems made expressly for these wealthy . . . heirs of the ancient nobility. . . . It is an eloquent confirmation of their principles, and a precious article of their drawingroom furniture"

M. Taine was often dazzled by his own brilliance, but never so much as when writing his famous chapter on Tennyson. Certainly there is some truth in these paragraphs; besides, Alfred de Musset filled all the room of all the critic's love. But Taine allows Tennyson so little; "We think of that other poet, away there in the Isle of Wight, who amuses himself by dressing up lost epics." He might as well have thought at the same time of Virgil dressing up lost epics in a Sicilian or a Campanian villa, anywhere away from Rome. He could not see the second Tennyson, a man not of the people perhaps, nor yet tortured by passion nor by pain-but him we know as The Ancient Sage, Ulysses, Lucretius, as the case might be. Let us however admit that the first Tennyson or his Day Dream was an article of drawing-room furniture; such also is a rose; and as the thought rises in our minds, we turn to the poem before us, and there we find the poet's best defence, and a "moral shut Within the bosom of the rose":

"Liberal applications lie In Art like Nature, dearest friend."

Alfred de Musset may make the heart bleed with pity or truth or pain unknown before; Robert Browning may fortify the soul as with strong new wine; but Alfred Tennyson may create in us the love of loveliness; and where we could neither be frightened into conviction nor preached into practice, he may entice us into nobleness:

"In spite of all
Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
From our dark spirits," (Keats, Endymion.)

The "Day-Dream" contains other morals, which each "may find According as his humours lead."

This graceful, delicate, and delightful poom grew out of the section entitled "The Sleeping Beauty," which appeared with some differences in the volume of 1830.

(108) "AMPHION" is another poem with a moral. This is quite another way of enticing us into nobleness. Probably there does not exist in all literature a more charming short poem than the one preceding; as to the merit of its successor we must be in some doubt. It has been improved in form, and contains many humorous touches; but the humour is somewhat heavy; and here again the poet's smile is "a grim one." Still, the poem is excellent work in many respects; and but for the personal suggestiveness of the whole, might be regarded as a fairly clever performance. But altogether the impression it leaves on the mind is a doubtful one; we can hardly say "Here we have the poet at his best."

It may be regarded as a privilege accorded to poets that they should despair of their time and place and race;

but Tennyson often comes near to abusing the privilege; and here in "Amphion" it is "a brassy age" in which "I could not move a thistle." This is perhaps to be regretted, for no poet has received greater reward or greater honour than Tennyson. An age that purchased 10,000 copies of the "Idylls of the King" within six weeks, proved itself to be no "brassy age;" no poet was so constantly supported by leaders of thought; and considering the unusual weaknesses that provoked criticism in his first two volumes, he has been dealt with by the critics most gently. He speaks of "months of toil," but we hardly realize the advantages afforded to a poet in these days of abundant editing, good printing, and low priced literature-to a poet, moreover, who is "heir of all the ages." In order to gain the same amount of knowledge, Milton must have laboured twice as hard and with discomforts innumerable. It is not strange that he should have become blind. Certainly he hoped to find "fit audience, though few;" but it can hardly be said that he realized the hope.

A poet who knows his art so well as Tennyson will employ double rhymes to give point to his humour; and they are well managed. Among the improvements, "spindlings" in the last stanza but one replaced "poor things." The first four lines of the fifth stanza were originally "The birch-tree swung her fragrant hair, The bramble cast her berry, The gin within the juniper Began to make him merry."

(109) "ST. AGNES' EVE." This, slightly altered, is the "St. Agnes" of "The Keepsake" of 1837. Why the title should have been changed in 1855 from "St. Agnes" to "St. Agnes' Eve," does not appear. Was the change due to the remark of a friend, "An iced saint is certainly better than an iced cream, but not much better than a frosted tree. The original Agnes is worth twenty of her?" Possibly the figure in the convent before us is not quite that of the young girl of thirteen who suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Diocletian; yet, on the other hand, she is no Madeline, of whom it might be said,

"They told her how, upon St. Agnes' Eve Young virgins might have visions of delight, And soft adorings from their loves receive Upon the honey'd middle of the night."

It will be best to regard her as another type of mediæval religion—the religion of the convent. She may be compared both with "St. Simeon Stylites" and "Sir Galahad." Again we are made to sympathize with the pure and beautiful enthusiast who has died away from all her human emotions, and become the tride for whom a Heavenly Bridegroom is waiting. What a fascinating religion the church of Rome gradually built up, whether for women or for men; and never before was the witchery of its ritual so wrought into verse. Wordsworth at his best, as in "Lucy," might scarcely match the music of these stanzas; their pictorial perfection he could hardly attain unto; every image is in such delicate harmony with the pure young worshipper, that it seems to have been transfigured by her purity, and in the last four lines the very sentences faint with the breathless culmination of her rapture.

(110) "SIR GALMAD" is an ideal of chivalry as well as a type of religion. But from one point of view he is St. Agnes in the form of a man. Like hers is his stainless purity and his ecstatic devotion to an ideal that has usurped the dearer instincts of humanity. But the poem though full of lyrical splendour is not so good as the former; that was perfect in its sufficiency; this is imperfect in its opulence; there is somewhat of "hig."

action" in the art. But the blemish is very slight, and taking the knightly theme into consideration, we expect more of action, colour, and sound. In the first stanza are striking—perhaps too striking—assonantal and onomatopæic effects. It is a question whether in stanza five "the tempest crackles on the leads" is in keeping with the former line. A reference to this poem is made on p. 35.

(111) "EDWARD GRAY." This is a pretty homely ballad of the type of "Barbara Allen," but much refined. The sentiment is that of Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona," IV. ii. 113-15:

"Pro. I likewise hear that Valentine is dead. Sil. And so, suppose, am I; for in his grave, Assure thyself, my love is buried."

(111) "WILL WATERPROOF'S LYRICAL MONOLOGUE." Here Tennyson has struck a much richer vein of humour than in "Amphion." The volume of 1842 is another volume of experiments, and most of them are successful. Of the many disguises assumed by the poet when he intends to have a talk to himself and a talk with us at the same time, this much-contented rollicking eloquence of the flowing can, or the maudlin-morality that haunts the vacant cup, is of the happiest possible. Such a feast as this of humour and wisdom, wit and imagination, ethics and fancy, philosophy and common sense all served up with excellent poetry, was never spread before in that famous tavern. We have not the heart to be captious when we find our poet, in "a kind of glory," "unboding critic pen;" or when he looks into the "empty glass" for "Hours when the poet's words and looks Had yet their native glow." And the one shadow of biographical regret that falls upon the poem sweeps away as we stoop to gather that exquisite violet of a legend -the

<sup>1</sup> Percy's "Reliques,"

Rape of Ganymede-which blows half-hidden among the chops and steaks.

- (114) "LADY CLARE." This excellent ballad, which has been subject to a few amendments, is less modernized than "Edward Gray." See also the poet's own note, p. 149.
- (115) "THE CAPTAIN" appeared first in the selection of 1865. It is not an excellent poem; scarcely good enough to serve as a warning. And the incidents are improbable; no enemy would riddle a ship that did not fire a shot in return. The metre, which is seldom at fault in Tennyson, is not so appropriate nor so well controlled as usual. Yet no one but Tennyson could have written the last four lines; they contain in the second and fourth lines the most delicately adequate rhythmical discord; and the imagery -as we have so often noticed at the close of other poems -is here seen and felt in its peculiar perfection.
- (116) "THE LORD OF BURLEIGH." Visitors to Burleigh House are still shown a portrait which is said to be that of the Lady Burleigh of this pathetic ballad. She died in 1797.

The trochaic measure is prevented from degenerating into sing-song by such discords as "Her sweet face from brow to chin." A further remark on the metre has been made on p. 197, and the style is noticed on p. 134.

(117) "THE VOYAGE." The hidden subject of this beautiful allegory is one very dear to Tennyson. It appears in "Ulysses," "To follow knowledge like a sinking star;" in "The Two Voices," "He sows himself on every wind;" in "The Princess," "O we will walk this world;" in "Sir Galahad," "I leave the plain, I climb the height;" in "Locksley Hall," "Not in vain the distance beacons; forward, forward, let us range;" in "Freedom," "O follower of the vision, still In motion to the distant gleam;" in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," "Follow Light;" and it finds fullest expression in "Merlin and the Gleam." Many other poems might be added to the above list, and many other poets mentioned who never paused in their voyage over the ocean of life, but ever followed "one fair vision—like Fancy, like Virtue, like Knowledge, like Heavenly Hope, like Liberty,"—and, we may add, like ideal truth, beauty, and goodness.

"Why faintest thou? I wander'd till I died. Roam on! the light we sought is shining still."

Though of later date than 1842, the poem has much in common with the quotation from "Locksley Hall" above, as in the lines:

"We loved the glories of the world, But laws of nature were our scorn;"

which again appears in "In Memoriam," "Under whose command Is earth and earth's." ("Epilogue," 36.)

The voyager may pass beyond the horizon of life; in "The Princess," the Prince continues, "And so Thro' those dark gates across the wild That no man knows;" but here, as in most of the later poems, the poet ventures beyond the doors of death:

"We know the merry world is round, And we may sail for evermore."

"Eternal process moving on From state to state the spirit walks."

In Memorian

So in "Merlin and the Gleam," the end was but the beginning, for

"There on the border Of boundless Ocean, Hovers The Gleam."

<sup>1</sup> See p. 119

nd as death drew nearer, this passion of "onward" rew stronger than ever in the heart of the poet; we may arn it from the last line of his last poem:

"On, and always on!"

ut there was one among the voyagers, "'A ship of ols,' he sneed'd and wept":

αί δ' ελπίδες βότκουσι φυγάδας, ὡς λίγος. καλοῖς βλέπουσαί γ' ὄμμασιν, μέλλουσι δέ.

"He saw not far; his eyes were dim "- εν ελπίσιν χρη τούς σοφούς έχειν βίον.

Apart from the allegory of earnest, lofty, and hopeful ving, the poem was an occasion for vivid painting of sea and distant shore.

(118) "SIR LAUNCELOT AND QUEEN GUINEVERE." hree poems of the volume of 1842 take their subject on the Arthurian legends; they are "Morte d'Arthur," Sir Galahad," and "Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinerer." To the latter title we notice the significant oppendage, "A Fragment." By this the poet seems to try, "I intend some day to build up the stories about ling Arthur into a great poem; meanwhile I am turning into verse one or two incidents here and there."-comance has here inspired a most brilliant lyric; better a some respects than "Sir Galahad."

(119) "A FAREWELL," probably to the brook so tenerly described in "In Memoriam" (ci.) It was in 1837 at the Tennysons left Somersby. Another poem in this blume, "Break, Break, Break," is to be associated with In Memoriam."

In this beautiful lament such rhymes as "deliver" and forever" lose all their discord. They are further sanconed by the usage of many good poets.

(119) "THE BEGGAR MAID":

"Young Adam Cupid, he that shot so trim
When King Cophetua loved the beggar-maid."

Romeo and Juliet, II. i. 134.

According to Shakespeare, in "Love's Labour's Lost," the ballad of the King and the Beggar was not to be found; and, adds Armado, "I will have that subject newly writ o'er."

Two versions are now extant, one in a collection of old ballads, the other in Percy's "Reliques." Cophetua was a mythical king of Africa; Penclophon (according to Shakespeare, Zenelophon) was the name of the beggarmaid. We have again the figure of Godiva "Like a summer moon Half dipt in cloud." There is little enough of rough merit in the two older ballads; Tennyson writes with his customary grace and charm.

- (119) "THE EAGLE," though a fragment, brings a fine bit of far-off nature delightfully near to us.
- (119) "MOVE EASTWARD." Possibly this fragment is retained because it seems to correct a popular fallacy; i makes the earth go east; but the effect to the uninitiated is not poetically pleasing.
- (119) "COME NOT WHEN I AM DEAD." These verse were contributed in 1851 to "The Keepsake," edited b Miss Power.
- (120) "THE LETTERS." This poem appeared in the "Maud" volume of 1855. As a ballad of modern life it is not very effective. It looks like earlier work than 185 "Gloom'd" and "athwart" are early favourites; "humm" a bitter song "may be compared with "humm'd a surl ymn" in "The Talking Oak"; "the wholesome human eart," with "Pray heaven for a human heart," in "Lady lara Vere de Vere." The first four lines of stanza iii. re graphic; the second four are bad. "When gifts of ine could please" -"Dulces exuviæ, dum fata deusque nebant." "As looks a father on the things," is not in ennyson's best manner; "the public liar" sounds of Maud." The last four lines in iv. are weak; "meanest pawn of Hell" in v. is effusive. "Like torrents from a jountain source" may compare with Shelley's

"Confused in passion's golden purity
As mountain springs under the morning sun."

The very graves appeared to smile, So fresh they rose in nadow'd swell," are weak lines; nor are the remaining nes good.

(120) "THE VISION OF SIN" takes a very high rank mong allegorical poems. It has undergone only slight lteration. Near the end were two additional lines:

"Another answered, 'But a crime of sense? Give him new nerves with old experience."

In this poem we notice some fine metrical contrasts, such as those in "The Brook," and "The Ancient Sage." The gging trochaic quatrains of section iv. are admirably dapted to the careless devilry of the speaker, but the excessive levity of the measure is judiciously tempered by such lines as "The chap-fallen circle spreads." There is a good deal that resembles Shelley, especially in section .; and the whole poem may have been suggested by his Triumph of Life." Other poets, notably Shakespeare and Milton, seem to have lent their aid. Nevertheless, the work is both original and powerful.

The allegory is easy to follow; and as in "The Pilgrim's Progress," the allegorical character is not less interesting han the ethical lesson he has been created to teach. It is just the opposite to the lesson we have been learning from "St. Simeon Stylites" and "St. Agnes"; they attempted t ignore the body; the youth in "The Vision of Sin" attempt to ignore the soul. And, thirdly, as was seen in "Th Palace of Art," there is in our time a tendency to live life of isolation in selfish intellectual pleasures. All thes are wrong; and they are fatal, each in its degree. Pos sibly this lust of the flesh is the most common of the thre failures to live the complete life; it is certainly the mos terrible and the most loathsome. We have before us young man, vigorous and highly gifted, but already ridin hard and weighing down to earth the winged horse of h soul. We see him enter the palace gates of sensua Pleasure; pleasure refined at first, but ever growin coarser as his jaded appetite demands fiercer excitement At length his senses grow dull:

> "A heavy vapour, hueless, formless, cold, Came floating on for many a month and year;"

his whole being is becoming withered; and when agai we see him, it is as a gray and gap-toothed man, slowl riding a worn-out hack; he alights at a ruined inn—th close of a ruined life; he is as lean as death, miserabl and prematurely old, degraded yet shameless, totterin yet malignant; then, drinking wine through "shrivell' lips," he sits mocking in the same breath both his Go and his fellow-men. But his voice grows faint; the en has come—what end?

The poet tries to penetrate the Divine purposes:

"Below were men and horses pierced with worms";

but from the mystic mountain come voices as of spirit who are contemplating the ruined life; the first spir pleads that sensual pleasure was its own punishment: for it gradually destroyed all capability of pleasure. The second urges that with the loss of pleasure came hatre of good; that passive self-indulgence ended in activ crime. But a third answers that the very desperation of the ruined man's last orgies proved that he was still troubled by a twinge of conscience. And in the earlier edition a fourth spirit would have him begin life over again with the advantage of this terrible experience. There is something like a glimmer of hope; but the sentence of the Great Judge is not recorded.

(123) "TO ——, AFTER READING A LIFE AND LETTERS." This poem appeared first as "To ——," in the "Examiner" of March 24th, 1849. Next it was printed in the sixth edition, 1850, and again with the second part of the title, and some slight alterations, in the eighth edition, 1853.

The tone of the poem has already been remarked upon; we hear again the "laudator temporis acti." "The many-neaded beast" of Pope and others is an ungracious expression. "Shakespeare's curse" had nothing to do with days that deal in ana." "Nor king"; -Tennyson himself has spoken feelingly of "That fierce light which beats upon a throne"; in that light the Kings of thought must sometimes stand; and perhaps no poet has so successfully anticipated criticism as Tennyson. For all that, the coet will secure our fullest sympathy and respect; when we have yielded him all that he claims, we shall shrink within ourselves at the thought of the enormous debt we now him still—and for ever.

(124) "TO E. L. ON HIS TRAVELS IN GREECE." These stanzas were first printed in the edition of 1853. They are addressed to Edward Lear, the landscape painter, and they refer to a book he had written, "Journals of Tours in Central and Southern Italy and Albania."

&lt;sup>q</sup> Compare also Tennyson's praise of Wellington:

&quot;Whatever record leap to light, He never shall be shamed."

This and the former poem are written in the stanza "In Memoriam," which has a lighter movement in bo especially in the second:—"By dancing rivulets fed flocks." The lines to E. L. are picturesque, and set for the poet's veneration for "classic ground."

(124) "BREAK, BREAK, BREAK." In the first star of the fifth poem of "In Memorian" the poet dwells the inadequacy of mere words to express emotion; resorrow lies so deep within the soul, and is so sacred, the give it outward shape in language is little short of p fanity. Moreover, as nature, the ample vesture of the Deity, makes his presence felt to us, yet disguises form, so words may convince the world of sorrow, but the same time blur its very outlines.

There is some of this sentiment in "Break, Bre Break;" and before proceeding to a consideration of poem, one is forced to enlarge the poet's doubt, a criticism will falter as it approaches such sacred loveness of sorrow.

Yet the mere sound of the poem, and the poignancy its anguish have such power to take captive our ear a heart, that we sometimes miss the beauty half conceale within it. Few of Tennyson's productions are so spetaneous as this; yet it is more than a mere cry of despator for in none does nature so eloquently express what wo and even melody can only conceal. Five times the pabandons the disguise of speech, and paints his sorr in a vivid picture. Before us lies the sea, powerless tell its sobbing trouble to the shore, as wave after wa of utterance dies broken on the cold grey stones, the shore the children are playing; what could they kn of death? Out on the bay the sailor boy is singing in happy activity of life; in the offing are ships return om a prosperous voyage, and sailing on majestically to e neighbouring port—four pictures in one; and in these e poet expresses more eloquently than in any words the use of desolation made yet more desolate by contrast th joys it cannot share. In "In Memoriam" the corsponding emotion may be discovered in one heartoken line, ne fifth picture is of the sea breaking hopelessly at the of crags that seem to spurn it from its desire; so ath stands inexorable between him and all that he wed.

"The noise of life begins again" (vii).

This pictorial rather than articulate representation of ief occurs frequently in "In Memoriam;" examples a furnished by such poems as the sixth, seventh, eighth, eventh, twelfth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, ninearth and twentieth. Indeed "Break, Break, Break" turally takes its place along with these, in one of which, a eighth, occurs the expression "a vanish'd eye," and another, the tenth, "a vanished life," expressions that im kindred with "a vanished hand." Also we may mpare

"O for the touch of a vanish'd hand And the sound of a voice that is still,"

h a passage in the thirteenth poem of "In Memoriam,"

"And, where warm hands have prest and closed, Silence, till I be silent too."

124) "THE POET'S SONG." In this poem we have esented to us another characteristic view of the poet's action:

"Longius et volvens fatorum arcana movebo."

"The marvel of the everlasting will, An open scroll, Before him lay." k

I "The Poet."

But Tennyson has looked into the twain eternities; and the poet who could hear a whisper "from o'er the gates of Birth," might well, and more clearly than other men hear the same whisper from the other distance:

"A breath
From some fair dawn beyond the doors of death."

The imagery again is characteristic; vivid, and fresh including also something of the past; "gates of the sun, like the "gates of the east" of Hyperion and the "eastern gate" of L'Allegro, is common poetic property; "waves of shadow" may be compared with the "waves of wheat in "In Memoriam" (xci) and Thomson's "Summer, "Sweeping with shadowy gusts the fields of corn." The wild swan is a favourite with Tennyson; in the "Prin cess" we read of "The leader wild-swan in among the stars."

The group "English Idylls and Other Poems," which ends here, includes all the poems of the 1842 volume except "The Skipping Rope." This very light piece of twelve lines has been omitted in all editions subsequent to the 6th (1850).

ADDENDA TO CHAPTER V.

Three other poems which have not been republished may receive mention here. In the winter of 1845, St. E. B. Lytton published anonymously "The New Timon a Romance of London." In this poem, which was partly narrative and partly satirical, he took occasion to denounce Tennyson in such couplets as the following:

"The jingling melody of purloined conceits,
Out-babying Wordsworth, and out-glittering Keats.

* * * *
Eet School-Miss Alfred vent her chaste delight
On 'darling little rooms so warm and bright.'"

He further attacked the poet because a pension of £200 a year had just been granted to him by Sir Robert Peel:

"Tho' Theban taste the Saxon's purse controuls,
And pensions Tennyson, while starves a Knowles."

Tennyson replied with pardonable bitterness in "The New Timon and the Poets," a poem of eleven stanzas signed "Alcibiades," which appeared in "Punch," Fcb. 28th, 1846. The fourth stanza is as follows:

"And once you tried the Muses, too;
You failed, Sir: therefore now you turn
To fall on those who are to you
As Captain is to Subaltern,

But the next number of "Punch" contained five more stanzas by Tennyson, headed "Afterthought;" and these stanzas, which placed him in a position of unassailable dignity, are now included among his published poems under the title of "Literary Squabbles." It should be added that in after years the relations between the Laureate and Lord Lytton were the pleasantest possible.

The second of these omitted poems—"Here often, when a child, I lay reclin'd,"—was contributed to "The Manchester Athenceum Album" in the year 1850; and the third consists of three stanzas published in "The Keepsake" for 1851. The last stanza is weak, but the first two possess some interest:

"What time I wasted youthful hours, One of the shining winged powers, Show'd me vast cliffs, with crowns of towers.

As towards that gracious light I bow'd, They seem'd high palaces and proud, Hid now and then with sliding cloud." <sup>2</sup>

In the third stanza the poet is encouraged to make his upward way to these beautiful abodes, for the path, though difficult, is "free to all."

<sup>1</sup> Edited by Miss Power. London: David Bogue.

&lt;sup>2</sup> A fragment of imagery to be compared with many other passages, such as "The soft white vapour streak the crowned towers." The Princess.

APPENDICES TO CHAPTER V.

APPENDIX I.

Notes on "Locksley Hall."

(a.) The hero of "Locksley Hall" is usually regard as a boy; and the poem is said to express "a boy resentment for imagined wrongs." As a fact the recolletions of youth are placed some years back, and the breathe of ardent hope; but the whole poem is the expression of almost disenchanted manhood. The speak of this long soliloquy ought to be nearer thirty that twenty. By a poet's licence Tennyson in "Locksley Has Sixty Years After" assigns the same date to two events

"Here we met, our latest meeting, Amy, sixty years ago."

The speaker on this occasion is eighty years of therefore, when he parted with Amy he was twenty.

But again, Amy lay "dead in child-birth . . . six years ago." 1 This could hardly have been.

The impression we receive on reading "Locksley Hal is that the man who was twenty when he left Amy to g and enlist in the army, has returned after a lapse of son years; he uses the expression "as of old;" talks of turing "that earlier page" before the strife" ("the strift occurred when he was twenty); and he further commen on his noisy lamentation over the lost love as follows:

"Shall it not be scorn to me to harp on such a moulder'd string?"

The lowest limit of age should be twenty-five. The leaves only five years wherein Amy's love will falter, who be given to another, whom she will wed; and some the thereafter she will die. Her lover in the same intervention has to learn that she has failed him; has then to become a soldier; to return again after an apparently long interval to the scene of love; and when that scene awakens the old love again, he scorns himself for harping on "a mouldered string."

<sup>1</sup> Couplets 18 and 19.

Unless we bear in mind some such approximate age of the hero, the several acts of the drama are liable to become confused. Nor is it easy to follow the speaker through the abrupt turnings in his reminiscences. As also in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," these sudden transitions may be in keeping with the character, but they demand the reader's close attention.

(b.) Much of the charm of "Locksley Hall" is due to the metrical movement. The ordinary stanza of four trochaic tetrameters is arranged in two lines; and the removal of the double rhymes strengthens at the same time the hands of the artist, and the material he moulds. It was a happy thought thus to transform the weakest of English measures into an impetuous sea-sounding rhythm. Yet in "The Lord of Burleigh," by making only a slight variation, Tennyson uses the old weak stanza with such art that with perhaps one or two exceptions, weakness is wrought into the simple sweetness of pathos.

(c.) It is always interesting to observe from time to time how poetical dainties of the past become "imbedded and injellied" in Tennyson's rich and ample pasties. This is more noticeable in the earlier poems. Some of them almost resemble Gray's well-known "mosaic;" "Locksley Hall" is one. You open an old Shakespeare at random; on the left hand page you read, "all that look on him love him;" though Tennyson's "Whom to look at was to love" is closer to the "But to see her was to love her" of Burns. Then on the right hand page you see a well-known passage which appears to hint that "Woman is the lesser man," as in the lines—

1 " Audley Court."

"Alas, their love may be called appetite, No motion of the liver, but the palate;"

these, besides their other similarities, seem to furnish the word "motions" in couplet 75 of "Locksley Hall." But this is "Twelfth Night," a play that deals with love; and you turn to a less familiar part of the volume, a collection of fragments at the end; yet here from the two pages you select "Love, whose month was ever May" to compare with couplet 10; then the "treble-dated crow" on the other open page recalls the "many-wintered crow" of 34; though this is still more like the "annosa cornix" of the Horace whom Tennyson knew by heart. "Every door is barr'd with gold and opens but to golden keys" has a likeness to

"The strongest castle, tower, or town, The golden bullet beats it down," on the same page.

"The many-wintered crow that leads the clanging rookery home" has some additional interest. A friend wrote to ask Tennyson why he first called the bird a crow, and then a rook; the main part of the poet's reply was to the effect that he was not much concerned with the ornithological question, and that he merely avoided the use of the word "rook" twice in the same line. But he might have added the well-known passage in "Macbeth,"

"The crow Makes wing to the rooky wood."

where "rooky" is generally understood to mean "the haunt of rooks," or, "abounding in rooks,"

APPENDIX II.

Note on "Love and Duty."

In the former appendix some random comparisons were made with Shakespeare. The following remarks on the at four lines and one or two other passages in "Love d Duty," will include similar references to Milton.

<sup>1</sup> This occurs also in "Love's Labour's Lost."

"Matin-chirp" (last line but three) which is a variation the "matin-song" of the "Poems by Two Brothers," d some later pieces, is represented in Milton by the shrill matin-song Of birds on every bough." Tennyson's full quire reminds us of Milton's "The birds their quire, pply," The lines "And morning driven her plough of pearl Far furrowing into light the mounded rack,"

Il first suggest some lines in "The Princess,"

"Morn in the white wake of the morning star Came furrowing all the orient into gold," nd both passages may next be compared with Milton's

"Now morn, her rosy steps in the eastern clime Advancing, sowed the earth with orient pearl."

Far furrowing" recalls "Far-sheening" on p. 145; and e notice that the hyphen is omitted. Our most important imparison, however, is the last line,

"Beyond the fair green field and eastern sea," hich finds an interesting parallel in "The parting sun

Beyond the Earth's green Cape and verdant Isles Hesperian sets."

Paradise Lost, viii. 630-632.

In the next line of "Paradise Lost" we read, "Be strong, we happy, and love," which appears in Tennyson's poem few lines back as "Live happy; tend thy flowers," tc.; and the two preceding lines in Tennyson,

"Shall sharpest pathos blight us, knowing all Life needs for life is possible to will," re represented in the immediate context of Milton,

"Take heed lest passion sway Thy judgment to do aught, which else free will
Would not admit . . . to stand or fall,
Free in thy own arbitrement it lies."

A few lines before in the Milton (587, 590) we reasure "Love refines The thoughts, the heart enlarges," which corresponds to

"Am I not the nobler thro' thy love?
Yea, three times less unworthy! Likewise thou Art more thro' love."

These comparisons between "Love and Duty" an "Paradise Lost" might be more than doubled in numbe At this time Milton seems to have gained yet greate power over Tennyson, and he may be said to have kep it for some twenty years longer.

CHAPTER VI.

ENOCH ARDEN, AND OTHER POEMS.

"ENOCH ARDEN." (125)

ORIGINALLY the "Enoch Arden" volume was entitled "Idylls of the Hearth." A note on this title will be found in Chap. XI. In subject, form, and style "Enoch Arden" is more properly an Idyll than any of the Arthurian Poems for which that title is still retained; they, strictly speaking, are heroic poems; but Tennyson called them Idylls chiefly because he hesitated to regard them as an Epic; and he changed the title of the present volume at the last moment probably because he felt that two volumes of Idylls following that of 1842 would be an excess, and

<sup>2</sup> A picture-poem, "Nature in the background, and in the foreground men and women of primitive manners and simple nobleness."

I The volume, "Enoch Arden, etc.," published in 1864, contained the following poems: "Enoch Arden." "Aylmer's Field." "Sea-Dreams" (which had appeared in "Macmillan's Magazine" for January, 1860. "The Grandmother" (formerly "The Grandmother's Apology," in "Once a Weck," July, 1859). "The Northern Farmer." "Tithonus" (which Thackeray had secured for the "Cornhill," Feb., 1860). "The Voyage." In the Valley of Cauteretz." "The Flower." "Requiescat." "The Sailor Boy" (first printed in a miscellany, "The Victoria Regia, "Christmas, 1861). "The Islet." "The Ringlet." "Welcome to Alexandra." "Dedication." "Attempts at Classic Metres in Quantity" ("Cornhill," Dec., 1864).

yet he must not give up his "Idylls of the King." Othe wise "Enoch Arden" is a narrative poem of humble lif like some of the "Tales" of Crabbe and Wordsworth.

In all the essential features of a moderately long poem in design, construction, finish, and impression, "Enoc Arden" is excellent. It is probably more perfect that any other of Tennyson's poems of equal or greater length "Lucretius" and the "Holy Grail" may be said to commearest to it, and "Guinevere" next; and it is more perfect than many of the shorter poems. For exampl "Dora," another story of simple life, when placed by is side, is seen at a great disadvantage; compared with the poem, the style of "Dora" is at once felt to be an artificial adornment, not a natural growth of beauty, and hence loses all its charm. The simplicity of "Enoch Arden asks no undue attention to itself; this and all other elements blend and are lost in one impression of perfectness.

As to the longer poems, "The Princess," "Maud," "I Memoriam," "Idylls of the King," it will often be foun useful to test some of their qualities by the process comparison with "Enoch Arden."

We need not apply to this poem the word "great; that epithet is reserved for works of grander scope; Tennyson, the "Idylls of the King" and "In Memoriam and some of the Dramas would be called greater poem But in its kind it is so great that the "Tale of the Prioress told by Chaucer, is not touched in honour by its compan It has met with adverse criticism; the story has been considered inadequate to the setting, overloaded with detained so forth; but the verdict of time will almost certain he forwardle.

For no poem could be better suited to Tennyson genius. It is long enough to produce an effect of creative power rather than creative prettiness; yet not too long to embarrass the poet with complexity of plot, diversity of character, or extent of prospect. And besides restricted scheme and scope, there are other respects in which it is peculiarly adapted to his poetic powers and tastes, especially the simplicity of a theme arising from lowly life. Poets are not expected to make tragic passion out of "The short and simple annals of the poor." The treatment will, therefore, be Idyllic-a manner to which Tennyson was inclined, and not epic nor tragic; the poem will take the form of an "Idyll of the Hearth." But simplicity in art, if absolutely natural, is beautiful and impressive by virtue of its striking perfectness; and whether the simplicity be a result of unconscious art, as in the "Pilgrim's Progress," or of conscious art rendered practically unconscious by emotion, as in "Enoch Arden," such works have a double charm; they will commend themselves to all classes of readers; to the unlearned by their artlessness, to the learned by the instinct or the art which makes that artlessness real or apparent.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See also Chapter xi.

The subject of the poem is probably known to all who use this book; if otherwise, they will scarcely neglect the first opportunity offered to them of reading one of the most truly pathetic stories in literature. It is not new in itself; Crabbe's "Parting Hour," and A. A. Procter's "Homeward Bound" furnished the framework; something also may have been suggested by Mrs. Gaskell's "Silvia's Lovers."

We are accustomed to regard the original materials of most of Shakespeare's plays as being honoured by their adaptation or absorption; this is not always our view of borrowing, especially with later poets; for the circumstances under which they borrow are changed considerably. But the question is fully discussed on p. 49. Here it may be profitable to notice the way in which Tennyson worked out his original. We may compare, for example, the well-known paragraph (663-677) beginning, "There Enoch spoke no word," with the following stanza in Miss Procter's ballad:

"It was evening in late Autumn,
And the gusty wind blew chill;
Autumn leaves were falling round me,
And the red sun lit the hill."

The rough sketch here supplied to him, Tennyson does not alter; he merely adds detail and colour. But in the course of his poem he departs from the main lines of the earlier narrative; in this the solitary mariner makes himself known to his wife and her new husband, gives the woman his blessing, and then goes forth again to the ocean, where he murmurs,

"I too shall reach home and rest."

Tennyson heightens the pathos of the story by making Enoch resolve

" Not to tell her, never to let her know."

This resolve some critics have questioned, perhaps needlessly; and the other question, "Ought Enoch to have marred Annie's happiness by making known to her his return through Miriam Lane," scarcely calls for serious consideration.

We have said that the main feature of "Enoch Arden' is a natural simplicity; for the story is one of simple village and sentating life, and everything in the poem is in har mony with the subject. The blank verse has none of the majesty of the "Passing of Arthur," nor the passion o "Lucretius," nor the free movement of "The Princess' or the Dramas, nor even the baldness of "Dora;" it is natural, quiet, homely; often conversational in its sim plicity; once it reaches tragic intensity, as in the lines 754-787, "Now when the dead man . . . and the boy my son;" and once is elevated to grandeur, in the description of the tropics, 568-595.

It may be noticed that the passage last mentioned is the only one in which the poet is led away from man to nature; and even in this he is describing the home of the "long-bearded solitary." That the rarer and grander aspects of nature often cast a spell over Tennyson, is abundantly evidenced by the "Recollections of the Arabian Nights" (1830) and "The Voyage of Maeldune" (1880), and by many poems in the fifty years between; as also by some poems that come after. As we have seen already, some of the best lines in "Locksley Hall" (couplets 78-82) are inspired by a vision of the tropics; and here in "Enoch Arden" the poet goes a little out of his way to make this splendid sketch of the island of eternal summer. He had been long accustomed to describe parts of England and of other lands that he had not seen, as may be gathered from "Poems by Two Brothers," written by boys who had "never been beyond their native county;"2 and, therefore, it is not surprising that the splendours of this "Eden of all plenteousness" should be represented even in such detail as "The league-long roller thundering on the reef," with which may be compared "In Memoriam," xxxvi (4):

> "Those wild eyes that watch the wave In roarings round the coral reef."

Otherwise, as more usually with Tennyson, nature is a pictorial illustration of the story; and as in his other poems, so in this, the natural scenery is marvellously in keeping with the humanity of the piece. Finest of all is the descriptive paragraph (663-677) already referred to, the desolate November scene through which the desolate wanderer treads wearily to his doom. Again, how often the sea fills up the human picture. But nothing in this connection is more striking than the first pa graph of the poem; it stands in the relation of dumb-sh to the old drama; every aspect of nature in these n opening lines suggests some scene in the tragedy follow. There is something like this in the next poe "Aylmer's Field," where the first paragraph of six lidimly foreshadows the approaching Nemesis.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 32. <sup>2</sup> See p. 5:

&lt;sup>3</sup> Although space does not admit of a fuller quotation, passages such as the following may be briefly indicated: "As the beacon-blaze allures The bird of passage" (724), "For sure no gladlier... (824-828), "there came so loud a calling of the sea" (904), "Crying with a loud voice 'A sail! A sail!" (907).

Another aspect of the simplicity of the poem is a covered by the poet's control of incident. The sittions are uncomplicated; often they are made obvious antithesis. Philip at the outset is the counterpart Enoch at the close; as a boy his eyes are flooded w "the helpless wrath of tears"; he loved in silence a sick father needed his care that autumn holid and thus he lent Enoch an opportunity of tellic his love to Annie; his self-sacrifice reached a clim when he saw the pair of happy lovers, read his door slipt aside like a wounded life, and had his dark he unseen.

So is it throughout the story; the bells ring merrily Enoch's wedding; they ring as merrily for the weddi of Philip; in the hazel wood Enoch won Annie

> "Just where the prone edge of the wood began To feather toward the hollow," and when Annie yields to Philip, the poet places the not only in the same hazel wood, but

"Just where the prone edge of the wood began To feather toward the hollow."

The characters are equally free from complexi Annie, the pivot of these situations, also holds the balan between the two chief actors, and is colourless enough add due colour to them. Had she been ever so lit heroic the piece would have been sport. A supernatural element 'appears in nearly all Tennyon's important poents—"The Princess," "In Memoriam," Maud," "Locksley Hall," "Idylls of the King," several the dramas, "The May Queen," "Aylmer's Field," and any others. In "Aylmer's Field" a telepathic communication of more scientific aspect 'a is in keeping with the more exalted personages and the story of higher life; this companion idyll it will take the form appropriate to simple folk and a Puritan tradition; that of unconscious rediction, strange presentiment, the homelier marvels of dream, and, most essential of all, a text of the holy ook to serve as a sign (491-2).

It is the same with all the elements that enter into the emposition of the poem—style, tone, atmosphere, feeling, umanity, all blend in one harmony of simplicity; there also concentration of narrative, avoidance of sensation, expression of false sentiment. And thus is produced that are unity of impression spoken of in the second paragraph f this chapter.

Finally we ask, Is there any moral shut within the osom of this rose? What ethical lesson may we expect of draw from the misfortunes of good and noble men? In "Aylmer's Field" Nemesis will overtake the transfersors, those parents who are too worldly-wise in eaking their own daughter's good; their house will be the unto them desolate. But this tragedy is without even use "dram of eale;" there is no excess nor defect of any uman passion that might have worked his doom for ny. Here no one sins except life itself; and for the evil to bare human life Nemesis may in some sense be reserved.

(Lines 578-583.)

noch Arden hears far away, "in the ringing of his ears," the pealing of is parish bells (609-611).

<sup>1</sup> Arising partly out of his mystic temperament. See p. 62.
2 "Star to star vibrates light: may soul to soul Strike thro' a finer element of her own."

<sup>3</sup> Globe reading of Hamlet I. iv. 36.

This then is the moral. On the scale of Infinity all is well. But

"Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass, Stains the white radiance of eternity, Until Death tramples it to fragments."

The laws that govern human life are doubtless the best under existing conditions; but no law is so just as not to to be unjust in some of its applications; and while the world is more and more the individual must often wither. The Lady of Shalott bought love at the price of death; all humanity buys life at the price of death; yet for all that we find it well to love and to live; "it is indispensable to acquire the advantage; it is lamentable to incur the evil."

Even if unrecorded on earth, the heroism of Enoch Arden, on the scale of infinity, would live and grow in strength and beauty for ever. One of the greatest of England's poets was well content to rest his fame "with God." He is not the least of heroes who suffers in silence, and the glory of whose victories has been unsullied by human acclaim.

But since Enoch's self-sacrifice has been recorded on earth, we are permitted to read its "moral" more clearly. The very intensity of his pathos made him more perfectly noble. He lifts the poor to the highest level of humanity; he makes them worthy of the world's regard and reverence; he is a pattern to rich and poor alike; and the influence of his sublime fate has become "The sweet presence of a good diffused."

(142) "AYLMER'S FIELD." The story told in this poem, which stands second in the Enoch Arden volume of 1864, was supplied to Tennyson by his friend Thomas Woolner, the sculptor. It has some points in common with Wordsworth's "Hartleap Well," in which a "grey-headed shepherd" tells the poet why "the spot is curst." Tennyson's story is referred to on page 160. The locality is probably the county of Kent, as may be judged from some of the cenery. The "little port" that buried "Enoch Arden" said to be Deal, in the same county.1 The title Aylmer's Field" is explained in the last ten lines of the oem, where we are told that the great hall-Aylmer's Hall-was "broken down" and that "all is open field." Iere, as often in other poems, the last few bars repeat ne opening phrases of Tennyson's music.

"Aylmer's Field," though it may be regarded as a ompanion idyll, is in many respects a great contrast to Enoch Arden." Selfishness takes the prominent position ormerly occupied by self-sacrifice; unlovely figures in ne high places of the world usurp the simply-noble illage folk; passion rages and destroys where emotion as refined and repressed; and fitful, or turbulent, or verstrained rhetoric often takes the place of a style erfect in its oneness of simplicity.

"Aylmer's Field" is a more powerful poem than Enoch Arden," yet less meritorious as a work of art. It too unequal; it has most of the faults whose opposites onstitute the chief beauties of the other work. For xample, "Enoch Arden" was a story, told as such, and ith faultless art; but in "Aylmer's Field" we have a ory, and too much besides. It is a remarkable fact, but ne only among several of the same kind, that in nearly l of his poems in which he takes occasion to speak for imself, Tennyson drags in some foreign nation. The rench come on the scene to receive the poet's censure "The Princess," "In Memoriam," "Aylmer's Field," Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," and some minor pems; in "Maud" it is the Russians; and in "Locksley all":

"The jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that Honour feels, And the nations do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels."

Some would place it in the Isle of Wight, some in Lincolnshire. But, a fact, like Shakespeare's enchanted island, it is best left unidentified.

There is nothing about the French or the Russians of any other nation in "Enoch Arden." But this subject of motive in "Aylmer's Field," as apart from the story, has been discussed in a former chapter.

Whatever may have been the details as given by Mr. Woolner, it is certain that some of the incidents in Tennyson's version are too near the verge of improbability. They would pass muster in a second-rate novel but in a poem of such importance and of such magnificence of workmanship as "Aylmer's Field" they become a more serious blemish. Something similar will be noticed in "Maud." Like the style, the dramatic intensity of the poem is unequal; the tragic issues are too momentous in proportion to the characters and the previous flow o passion or the nature and sequence of the incidents "From Edith was engraven on the blade"-" redden'd with no bandit's blood "-terrors like these might adorr the end of some desperate lover in melodrama, or even o an Othello or a Brutus, but they are scarcely in keeping with "such a love as like a chidden babe After much wailing, hush'd itself at last;" and the well-known sermon a wonderful piece of declamation in itself, is surely too long and too loud for its setting.

On the other hand, as in "The Princess," nothing car exceed the beauty, or truth, or grandeur of the parts. The beauty alone must concern us here. "Aylmer's Field," "Enoch Arden," and "The Gardener's Daughter's set forth the peculiar loveliness of an English landscape or an English homestead with a truth and an effectiveness never attained, attempted, dreamt of before. Those who think this praise excessive may temper it by adding "Ir Memoriam," "The Miller's Daughter," and "The Brook," and then allowing the six poems to take the place of the three. Or they may add so many more that other poets will be surpassed by the mere number of Tennyson's oving and masterly sketches of his native land. To uote examples from "Aylmer's Field," where they are o abundant and so perfect, would be superfluous; but he pathetic descriptive passage at the close 1 may be mentioned as an example, first of realism in its more egitimate effects, and next of the poet's accurate obseration of the humbler aspects of nature.

<sup>1</sup> See pp. 159 and 162.

Turning now to the characters, we first notice that if Leolin had been made more heroic, he would have spoilt the tragedy as Tennyson was choosing to shape it. The leart played by his brother has been explained on a corner page. We have no hero in this poem; and fir Aylmer who, after Leolin, might have stood above the lest, has no redeeming feature, and is therefore almost a aricature. Iago was an inarticulate poet; but this would-be "villain" is absolutely colourless—or overdrawn, which amounts to the same thing. Tennyson is thinking, not of the human being, but of the social mistake which that human being is to hold up to the light for the time's behoof. One touch of natural affection brings him for a moment closer to humanity—but he was warm with wine:

"She look'd so sweet, he kiss'd her tenderly, Not knowing what possess'd him."

Lady Aylmer— as often in Shakespeare— is the male haracter over again in the form of a woman. The Indian tousin has individuality, and his presence, though fitful, is always a pleasant relief. Edith, like Maud, is not a character; she is a beautiful vision called up by love, and nade ours for ever by death. For such we set apart a hrine within the soul where the noise of common life nay not be heard, nor the light of common day penetrate. And perhaps at some holier moment we gaze inwardly upon the vision till the heart beats more sweetly and more calmly, and the blood flows through our being like a liquid joy.

<sup>1</sup> Lines 846-853.

And if now, as at the close of our reflections upon "Enoch Arden," we choose to draw a moral from the poem before us, it must be the moral of pity and fear deduced by Aristotle from all tragedy of wrongdoing; but we must spread out our compassion and feel the fear in a way somewhat different from Aristotle's intention. Two young and beautiful lives that had been "together from the first," and who "might have been together till the last" are sacrificed to "marriage-hindering mammon." To these we give our pity against false pride and the worship of wealth we watch and pray. From their "narrow gloom" the wretched parents call to us in the very words of the broken-hearted poet:

"As ye have lived, so must ye die;—O Terror, Strike through these stubborn worldlings to the core;—
If heaven can little win your hearts from error

Let hell do more."

(139) "THE BROOK." It may be presumed that Lord Tennyson arranged the list of contents prefixed to the one volume edition of his works. But it is not always easy to discover the principles that govern the arrangement. This group of five is called "Enoch Arden and Other Poems" but only two of the remaining four, "Aylmer's Field," and "Sea Dreams," were published in the "Enoch Arden' volume of 1864. "The Brook" appeared in the "Maud' volume of 1855, and "Lucretius" in the "Holy Grail' volume of 1870.

Besides "The Brook," the "Maud" volume contained "The Letters" of the former chapter; also "The Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington," "The Daisy," "To the Rev. F. D. Maurice," "Will," and "The Charge of the Light Brigade" all of which are found in the group follow ng "The Princess," and will be considered in Chapter

It will be seen in the table of contents above mentioned, at the first four of the group, "Enoch Arden and Other coems," are printed at the same distance from the margin, thereas "Lucretius" stands nearer to it. This arrangement probably implies that the first four are a group of tylls.

Of the poems that were printed with "Maud" in the olume of 1855, "The Brook" is by far the best. It hould be compared with "Dora," and in the comparison, rhile "Dora" discovers itself perhaps altogether as an rtificial imitation of Wordsworth's simpler style,2 "The Brook" will appear the more perfectly original and sucessful; it calls for comparison with Wordsworth, being lmost as natural in its happiness as the poem of "The Brothers" is natural in its sorrow. More than ever the cenic background sets off the human picture; indeed, some ortion of the natural scenery plays a human part in the preground; for the brook, the inarticulate presentment f eternity amid time, is made to chant in human tones its appy everlasting hymn. This is a great advance on The Talking Oak." The story, too, is a delightful one elightfully told, which could not be well said of "The ardener's Daughter." As to the workmanship, the poet's omplete mastery over his art is not contested by a single lemish. Moreover, in this most perfect of all the idylls e find an easier yet subtler faculty of characterization, hether the type is rugged like old Philip,3 or the bailiff, or delicate like Edmund and Katie Willows. We find also a finer grace of form and colour; the transcripts from nature for example, are more striking yet none the less apt, than in earlier poems; "Such a time as goes before the leaf, When all the wood stands in a mist of green"; "It has more ivy"; a remarkable example of isolated local colouring; "High elbow'd grigs"; "lissome as a hazel wand"; "In gloss and hue the chestnut, when the shell Divides threefold to show the fruit within";

<sup>1</sup> Prefixed to the one vol. ed. of "Tennyson's Works."

<sup>2</sup> It is a good plan to read Dora first, and then Wordsworth's Idyll "The rothers," mentioned below. The chief impression left on our minds by the rmer poem is that the poet is a good showman; but by Wordsworth our huls are bowed down with pity at the pathos of life.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Old Philip's constantly recurring phrase, "and so the matter hung," made us of "It stinted, and said ay" of Juliet's nurse. And Philip is st such another chatterer.

"By that old bridge which, half in ruins then, Still makes a hoary eyebrow for the gleam Beyond it."

"Twinkled the innumerable ear and tail."

Nor have the various shades of emotion been so delicately blended as now; the poet does not fail to make audible "The still sad music of humanity":

"Poor lad, he died at Florence quite worn out. . . ."

"Poor Philip, of all his lavish waste of words Remains the lean P. W. on his tomb," and thus by contrast he heightens the harmonizing effect of the brook's glad eternal melody.

Tennyson delights to weave his story out of the happy sadness of memory; in "The Miller's Daughter" the old squire tells to his wife "Across the walnuts and the wine" the history she knows so well of their life of long ago; in "The Gardener's Daughter" the aged artist unfolds "the most blessed memory of his age"; and here by the brook, after twenty years of absence, Laurence Aylmer stands musing. The brook babbles as of old; the scene around him is unchanged; it restores the life of twenty years before. His thoughts return to the young poet brother who sang the song of the brook, with whom he parted on this very spot, and who went to Florence to die. Once more Katie Willows comes to him and tells him the rouble of her love; and once more he lends a patient ear o old Philip's "daylong chirping." The sequel to all this s so happily and daintily wrought out by the poet that iny further comment would imperil one of the finest effects n this kind of poetry.

The words "lucky rhymes" in the fourth line of the dyll are a little curious. They are most probably suggested by "lucky words" in the twentieth line of "Lycidas"; but Milton uses the term in the sense of "that wish luck," and Tennyson uses it in Cowper's sense of "though apt, vet coy." But it is possible that Milton's phrase was not present to him.

Originally the words "an Idyl" were added to the title, 'The Brook." By this the poet implied that "The Brook" was the only poem of the kind in the "Maud" olume.1

(156) "SEA DREAMS." This idyll, as we have seen, originally (p. 201) stood third in the "Enoch Arden" volume of 1864. Like others in that volume it is fitly called an "Idyll of the Hearth." The story of "The Brook" was the flower of romance; in "Sea Dreams" ve have a meagre incident from the most homely life.

1 Tennyson's sketch of "The Brook" may be compared with one in the wenty-fifth stanza of the "Hallowe'en" of Burns, where the picturesque bickering" is found; and the refrain, "men may come," etc., resembles the ollowing inscription on a sun-dial:

> "Io vado e vengo ogni giorno, Ma tu andrai senza ritorno."

The word "waterbreaks" may come from one of Wordsworth's sonnets-'dancing down its waterbreaks." Cf. also his stanza:

> "Down to the vale this water steers, How merrily it goes; 'Twill murmur on a thousand years, And flow as now it flows,"

But as the brook which gave a name to the former poem entered like a joyous being into its composition, so the sea which appears with such significance in the title of this poem, also becomes a living presence that lends grandeur to the whole work. How much we may learn from the mere title of a poem is a fact often noticed in the present treatise, and there is no doubt that the main intention of the poet in regard to these two poems is to be discovered in their titles. In "The Brook" and "Sea Dreams" certain forms of nature are brought into closer relation with humanity, and endowed with an utterance more divine than human-"With Him there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning "-this is the voice of the brook. The other is the mighty voice of the ocean-"Thy judgments are like the great deep." And these iudgments, as we learn from "Sea Dreams," are forgiveness and love.

This is another notable feature of Tennyson's idylls; they range from the light and graceful picturing of human loves among fair scenes of nature to the picturing, through nature, of a love that is divine; and "Sea Dreams," which is so sublime in its simplicity, fitly concludes the series.

Among the many important aspects of the poem is Tennyson's view of satire expressed in the lines, beginning "I loathe it." As to the satire itself,—"With all his conscience and one eye askew," the poet seems to say to us, "You see how I could write the well-known couplets if I chose, but I do not choose." The germ of this "old satire" may perhaps be found in Shakespeare's "Richard III." I iii. 323-338: for Gloucester, whose arm or back were askew, as was all his conscience, says.

"I do the wrong, and first begin to brawl. . . . But then I sigh, and with a piece of scripture Tell them that God bids us do good for evil: And thus I clothe my naked villainy

With old odd ends stolen out of holy writ;
And seem a saint when most I play the devil." 1

No poet has described dream-life so fully and accurately as Tennyson. In "The Brook" which we have just left, this realistic passage occurs:

"As one before he wakes
Who feels a glimmering strangeness in his dream."

"In Memoriam" contains many interesting studies from the world of dreams; and this is true of other poems; indeed, the subject is important enough in Tennyson's works to deserve separate treatment.

In this poem one dream is well conceived, and both are such as we "recollect Just ere the waking," 2 for each is caused by the noise that also breaks it. The husband's dream is natural; but the woman could not possibly dream out all that allegory. Such a history of discordant creeds that become music "in the roll And march of that Eternal Harmony,"—this and other interpretations that might be offered, tend to show that the allegory, like the mad scene in "Maud," has too much

1 The line

"So false, he partly took himself for true,"

s like the passage in "The Tempest," I. ii. 100-102,

"Who having unto truth, by telling of it, Made such a sinner of his memory

To credit his own lie."

The line

"And snakelike slimed his victim ere he gorged," appears with a variation in "The Princess,"

"And dress the victim to the offering up."

The figure, "oily", occurs in "King Lear," I. i. 228,

"I want that glib and oily art To speak and purpose not;"

compare also the "oily courtesies" of "The Princess."
2 "Lucretius."

method in it. Nor does the poet's own interpretation, though purposely distorted, remove the impression of improbability. Further, the "loud-lunged Antibabylonianisms" of their Boanerges pulpiteer, or "The preaching man's immense stupidity," as Browning calls it, have little in common with the dream except "the ruin of a world."

The poet's power of gesture-painting already referred to is conspicuous in such lines as "And then began to bloat himself, and ooze All over with the fat affectionate smile That makes the widow lean"; this appears in "The Princess" as "oozed All o'er with honey'd answer." Still better known is the passage

"Then my eyes
Pursued him down the street, and far away,
Among the honest shoulders of the crowd,
Read rascal in the motions of his back,
And scoundrel in the supple-sliding knee."

Equally familiar is the tender picture of domestic love which closes the poem. But a word must be said about the characters; we have met them all elsewhere --all but the woman; she moves amongst the rest, a healing presence of forgiveness and love, till they too are subdued unto her loveliness; and she can only be compared to that other Presence felt throughout the poem --the Ocean of Love itself.

(161) "LUCRETIUS." "Lucretius" was first published in "Macmillan's Magazine" for May, 1868, and was subsequently reprinted as the last poem in "The Holy Grail" volume of 1870.

In many respects it is a remarkable work. In no other has Tennyson's dramatic, or rather monodramatic, faculty expressed itself with such assurance and at the same time with such passionate force. It is easily the most powerful of all his shorter poems. "Love and Duty" would rank next. Nor is there anything in the dramas that could be compared with its vivid dramatic portraiture.

Next, the incident chosen was a doubtful one for Tennyson to deal with, although he had previously written "Vivien." With some it would be a question whether these fleshly effects of a love potion are a fit subject for poetical treatment at all. In Matthew Arnold's "Tristram and Iseult," the magic cup is an occasion for nothing more serious than fine love poetry; but the intermittent ravings of Lucretius, however they may be contrasted with his saner moods, carry us beyond the bounds of human experience, or at least of the human experience that lies within the region of legitimate art. We do not draw pictures of fowls that are moulting—though, after all, we might, for their condition is not exactly abnormal.

It has already been pointed out that there are two ways of securing novelty of effect in art; one is by introducing material sometimes regarded as abnormal; such in modern literature would be the dialect of "The Northern Farmer," the social corruption of "Don Juan," the amorous maladies of "Poems and Ballads" (First Series), the daring nakednesses of "Leaves of Grass." This is the easier way; and it may lead to notoriety instead of renown. The other, which is difficult, is the more literary method, noticed several times in this volume, where attempts have been made to guess the secret of Tennyson's early charm; seen also in that medley of easy wit and unstudied pathos in "Don Juan," in the strong new music struck from the instrument of words in "Poems and Ballads" (First Series), and in the vigour and freshness and aptness of phrase of "Leaves of Grass."

Apart from this possible objection, "Lucretius" remains the masterpiece of Tennyson. It was also a masterpiece in regard to choice of subject—we are not now referring to the philtre, but to the groundwork supplied chiefly by the great poem of the Roman writer. Indeed, we might almost say that the earlier artist left to Tennyson little more than the condensing and re-shaping of the work. "Tithonus" was a much more difficult study; materials were meagre, the character was shadowy. But in the "De Rerum Natura" Tennyson had before him a living model; this, being a great artist, he would reproduce in lifelike dramatic portraiture; such a result would more certainly follow the reading of a work whose pathos penetrates the soul like some keen electric force. Tennyson is reported to have said to a friend, "I shall never write a good drama; I have not enough passion." But we might almost say of his "Lucretius" that the poem is sometimes profound in its passion, and sometimes pants with it.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 40, footnote.

Also from the "De Rerum Natura" Tennyson naturally draws much of his material; sometimes he is content with paraphrase or even translation. Other classical writers are occasionally called upon for contribution. But the incident of the love potion and the manner of death are not derived from sources strictly classical—a fact that lends weight to the objection noticed above.

"Tithonus" was Greek in manner, and but slightly modern in sentiment; "Lucretius," as would be expected, is Roman, and is infused with not a little of our century's pessimism. Avoiding details, which would be exceedingly numerous, and having regard only to the general effect of the poem, we may add that the darkness of its night is relieved by an implied remoteness. By re-writing the tragedy—not so much of the death of Lucretius, whatever that may have been, as of what may perhaps be called the tragedy of his poem—Tennyson has given it perspective: he would have us say to ourselves, "Thus the noble melancholy enthusiast of those dark Roman days thought and died"; and there follows something like a moral: "Some say the night is father of the light." For all that we may also detect in the laureate's great poem not a little of his habitual inclination to be fascinated by the dark, as well as his one opportunity of letting "darkness keep her raven gloss."

1 "The Ancient Sage."

"For the drift of the Maker is dark."—Mand.

See also the remark of Mr. Knowles, p. 159, footnote. To this may be added Tennyson's own observation to Mr. Knowles concerning "In Memoriam," It's too hopeful, this poem, more than I am myself." Yet in order to be strictly impartial, it seems best to believe on this as on many other occasions, that there were two Tennysons; and these two may be discovered side by side near the end of the Fourth Canto of "The Princess," in the seventeen lines preceding the song "Thy voice is heard thro rolling drums."

CHAPTER VII.

"THE PRINCESS."

I. "A MEDLEY." Shakespeare once wrote a play to be performed "on Midsummer day at night." This "midsummer" frolic of youthful fancy was delightfully adapted to the occasion; but the author was careful to explain its incongruous elements and improbable incidents by the wording of the title; therefore he called it "a dream." And in order to be sure that his audience would take him at his word, he seized every opportunity that the piece afforded him of reminding them of its dream-like character; and at the conclusion, the speaker of the epilogue begged them to imagine that they had but "Slumber'd here While these visions did appear."

In the same way Tennyson calls his "Princess" "A Medley;" repeats his description in a prologue, "This were a medley;" tells us in the body of the work that "raillery or grotesque or false sublime" will now give place to a more heroic style; and then, in an epilogue, after making the admission:

"And drove us, last, to quite a solemn close," he adds with peculiar emphasis:

"I moved as in a strange diagonal, And maybe neither pleased myself nor them," In spite of the poet's most explicit statement, many commentators are at the pains to prove that "The Princess" is not "a medley;" the real, they say, does not jostle with the ideal, nor mediæval chivalry with girl graduates, nor mediæval romance with modern science; if they find that opposing elements do not serve the purpose of contrast, they endeavour to show that these elements harmonize, and thus they destroy their individuality; in short, to quote from the play of Shakespeare above referred to, they everywhere "find the concord of this discord."

We prefer to take Tennyson, like Shakespeare, at his word; "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is a dream; and

"The Princess" is a medley.

Whether as a work of poetic art "The Princess" ought ever to have been a medley, is a question that will thrust itself upon us when the story comes to be considered. This much, at present, is certain; it is easier to write a medley than a work which exhibits throughout harmony of design and consistency of treatment.

If Tennyson had not called "The Princess" "A Medley," we might perhaps have rested satisfied with the severe criticism brought to bear upon his work by the poet himself after its first appearance in 1847. Yet the numerous alterations in scheme or in detail which were made in the subsequent editions, strongly support the previous part of this chapter. And finally, after all this revision, the appellation "A Medley" was still retained.

Few poets have made so many comments upon their writings as Tennyson. Not seldom his poems are disfigured by some "prelude of disparagement." Of these notes and apologies many have been suppressed; but from "Poems by Two Brothers" to "Demeter," the tendency to self-depreciation is still noticeable. In "Morte D'Arthur" it seems to raise a technical question, "Why bring the style of those heroic times?" and again, in "The Princess," "What style could suit?" But the subject has been discussed in the first Appendix to Chapter I., and in another aspect it will be glanced at in the Appendix to Chapter XI.

II. "THE PRINCESS" COMPARED WITH OTHER POEMS. The following considerations are more important to our present subject. From the Appendix to Chapter XI. we learn to look for signs of hesitation in all Tennyson's longer poems-"The Princess," "In Memoriam," "Maud," and the "Idylls of the King." For the outpouring of his grief and love in "In Memoriam" the poet chooses no framework; not even a series of sonnets; he employs unequal groups of stanzas. "The Princess" and the "Idylls of the King" are seen to be tentative epics, while "Maud" is a tentative drama. To tell a story is, primarily, the easiest thing in literary art; therefore, for his first essay, "The Princess," Tennyson will choose the form of a story. But as the story of "The Princess" was lofty enough and long enough to grow dangerously like an epic, the poet hit upon the happy device of parcelling it out among several storytellers, and in later editions he assigned to the ladies their important parts, the songs they sang between the various sections, whereby his poem gained greatly in consecutive ness and unity. King Arthur, "the grandest subject in the world," seemed to call unequivocally for epic treat ment; but again the poet proceeded with caution, and pieced it out among more or less disconnected episodes In "Maud," as noticed elsewhere, a series of lyrics effect the rise and fall of the curtain, paint the scenery, developed the one character, and save the poet much managemen of incident; in fact, he thus contrived to get almost as nea to drama was as possible without attempting what, afte all, is the real life of drama-interaction of characters Tennyson's own view of the dramatic qualities of "Maud is not entirely different from the foregoing: —"No other poem (a monotone with plenty of change and no weariness) has been made into a drama where successive phases of passion in one person take the place of successive persons." <sup>1</sup>

But it is not in design alone that Tennyson's longer poems show signs of weakness. Weakness hitherto has been concealed within shortness. Indeed, we could hardly expect to find the perfect workinanship of "The Palace of Art" in every paragraph of "The Princess." This again, being the first of Tennyson's longer poems, affords the most numerous examples of the weakness described in a former chapter. There was always in Tennyson a tendency towards puerility together with that excessive refinement of phrase which really touches the borders of bathos. There is scarcely a considerable poem he has written that does not discover an example of this tendency. Lucretius, the most consistently powerful of all his writings, and, even in metre, strong with the strength of its original, is probably the only exception.

III. OTHER FEATURES:—What then are the merits of "The Princess"? Briefly, they are those of Tennyson's other long poems; the matchless beauty and the priceless wisdom of parts. Lovers of "In Memoriam" will not be blind to its occasional banalities nor deaf to its occasional discords, but they will know by heart more than half of the sections of the poem. When readers of "Maud" reach Parts II. and III., they may be surprised at the intrusion of intellectual elements into the exposition of emotion, but they will return to Part I. and read it again, and be more than ever convinced of its surprising loveliness and astonishing originality. Next, considering the magnitude of the work, it may be said that in the "Idylls of the King" weakness is rarer and excellence more sustained than in any other of these four poems. As to "The Princess," it may be a medley; but the medley includes such a prodigality of beauties, that-if the statement be not ungrateful-we run some risk of becoming surfeited with sweets. There are many passages in "The Princess" that surpass, line for line, almost any other poetic work of the same kind out of Tennyson; and the whole poem is so replete with what is wise and good and graceful, that in this respect it may be compared with "In Memoriam," but, as far as we are aware, with no other poem in literature.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Nineteenth Century," January, 1893.

For a first example of particular passages, let us take a paragraph of mock-heroic style, in which the sobriety of Tennyson might not be supposed to excel. "The Rape of the Lock" has been compared to "The Princess"-a very unfortunate comparison for Pope; by the side of "The Princess" the graceful form of Pope's famous poem can no longer conceal coarseness of wit, meanness of satire, finality of fancy, insincerity of artifice; it is the perfection of pettiness.

But in Tennyson even the fireworks of fancy flash against a moonlit heaven of imagination, and there is nothing in "The Rape of the Lock," and surely, again, there is nothing in all literature that can approach such a delicate interweaving of the graceful and the grotesque as will be found in a passage already quoted.1

Next, as regards word-painting, the description of the tournament may be a little overwrought, but to match it we go naturally to "The Idylls of the King." Of gesturepainting the examples are admirable and abundant;

> "Thereat the Lady stretch'd a vulture throat. And shot from crooked lips a haggard smile" is one among a dozen such. The small sweet idyl: "Come down, O maid, from yonder mountain height," is of extraordinary excellence. As to the songs, they, of course, are matchless; one of them, "Tears, idle Tears," is so wonderful that it must have separate notice.\(^1\) Indeed, to describe a tenth of the minor beauties of "The Princess" is far from possible. Certainly, as hinted above, the poet's thoughts sometimes appear over-dressed; and remind us of certain photographs in which the finery and not the person makes the picture. But on this very account of excess of ornament the poem offers the best material extant for the student of literary art. In regard to Humour, it will be found that the article on this subject in Chapter I. makes special reference to "The Princess," Nature, in this poem, is mostly ornament, or the handmaid of human emotion; but how excellent is the poet's work in either case:

"Not a thought, a touch, But pure as lines of green that streak the white Of the first snowdrop's inner leaves."

This remarkable climax, following close upon another, reminds us of

"Chaste as the icicle
That's curdied by the frost from purest snow,
And hangs on Dian's temple."

Chaste as a cold, bright point of ice; not any ice, but ice curdied; not by any other agency, but by frost; not from water, but from the melted snow; not any snow, but the purest; the purest of the pure, for it lay on the roof of the temple of the goddess of chastity herself. So with the other; pure as a fine line; a line of green; pencilled on white, the white of a snowdrop, of the "first snowdrop of the year;" and on the snowdrop's inmost leaves. The next quotation puts us in mind of the manner in which Victor Hugo makes nature interpose to sympathise with human emotions:

<sup>1</sup> Pp. 250-258.

"Till notice of a change in the dark world Was lispt about the acacias, and a bird That early woke to feed her little ones Sent from a dewy breast a cry for light."

The change in the dark world suggests change—sweet change of dawn—in the darkened heart of the princess; in nature it is the dawn of love; of a mother's love for her offspring; such as the princess had dreamt of when she felt the helpless orphan hands about her breast in the "dead prime." All this comes out from the words, "her little ones." Before leaving the passage we may notice the poet's exactness. The dark world is the "dead prime," or the "dark summer dawns" of "Tears, Idle Tears,"—" For night is darkest just before the dawn." The change that was "lispt" is the breeze of morning trembling o'er the leaves,—the breeze that time after time 's wept with its sweets across the lyre of Tennyson.

Hitherto we have spoken more particularly of the "graceful"; it remains for us to say that the "wise" and "good" are everywhere abundant; "Better not be at all than not be noble" is one among hundreds of such jewels of truth cut and polished by this most cunning of craftsmen. To sum up, we may pass from isolated passages, and refer to the last canto as containing within itself—not humour, for it is the "solemn close,"—but almost all other excellencies of poetry; and it contains nothing but such excellencies.

IV. THE SUBJECT. (a) In its general aspect. Originally male and female are often one physical being. The ideal individual man and woman of the future also form one being, physical, mental, and moral. Another ideal which has less regard for the individual, pictures the sexes as equal yet different parts of a community, each part finding its own in the other's good.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," xcv. "Maud," Part I. xxii. 2, etc.

Of these two ideals, the second or collective, is the more modern; and, at its best, seeks to include the first.

Tennyson, as we have seen in his politics, was an individualist. Therefore in his "Princess" the relation between the sexes is mostly individual—a relation which is expressed with striking felicity in the last line but one of his poem, " Accomplish thou my manhood and thyself."

This, then, is the first fact to be borne in mind by readers of "The Princess." For the more modern ideal they must turn to other writers.

The relation between men and women has varied from time immemorial. But from fable alone can we gather that the women ever had it all their own way; as in the case of the "legendary Amazons" who, bee-like, had turned out the drones. Oftener, historically at any rate, the opposite has been reported—that man, like chanticleer, "Stoutly struts his dames before." Having glanced at these extremes we may sum up in one line the varying position of women in the past—"This hour a slave, the next a deity;" adding, however, that the slave position has been the more usual one.

In natural history, again, we find on a lower scale, examples of almost all the varying relationships between men and women; it will be enough to say generally and very briefly, that maternal duties have made the female sex physically weaker, more passive, more patient; adroit, gentler, more attractive.

Therefore what men have prized in women is tenderness, beauty, love; what they have missed is, to use the idea of Milton, matchable conversation. All this is being altered now:

" For in the long years liker must they grow."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The liver vein, which makes flesh a deity." Love's Labour's Lost, IV. iii. 74. "Superstition all awry."—The Princess, ii. 121.

Already women are less maternal, less wifely, less loveable: they have not been content with acquiring a more matchable conversation. Love must lose something; something may be gained. But when a future Carlyle sketches his Blumine he must leave out one priceless sentence—"Not a caprice he could spare." Our remaining reflection will be a judicial one:—"It is indispensable to acquire the advantage; it is lamentable to incur the evil."

(b) In its relation to "The Princess." The many women of Tennyson's earlier volumes are conventional; but they are the best of their kind. There are the "innocent-arch" Lilian; Isabel, "model of wifehood," "queen of marriage," of finish'd chasten'd purity"; there are Adeline, shadowy, dreamy; Elëanore, serene, imperial; there are Madeline, perfect in love-lore; Margaret, pale and pensive; there are loving, laughing Leonora, wild Rosalind, gallant Kate; and there is the smart maîtresse de ses sens, the lady of the skipping rope:

He. "Nay, dearest, teach me how to hope, Or tell me how to die."

She. "There, take it, take my skipping-rope And hang yourself thereby."

They are all delightful, all loveable; but of none are we told that she was eminently intellectual. They would surely tell us of themselves, every one of them, that "men hated learned women;" and the poet, when he drew them with such delight of daintiness, would surely be saying the same.

We next notice the importance thus early attached by Tennyson to love and marriage as the portion of women, to home as their sphere, and to maternity as their first duty: 1 the intellectual qualities, capacities and pursuits

"What every woman counts her due,
Love, children, happiness."

The Princess, iii, 228, 229, are never allowed to take rank with these. For example, when we read

"The child shall grow
To prize the authentic mother of her mind," we look closely at the word "authentic," and suspect that the poet is postponing affection to intellect. But we are to be undeceived; no sooner has the princess made this seeming plausible statement than she unwittingly testifies to the enormous preponderance of one hour of "authentic" motherhood:

> "I took it for an hour in mine own bed This morning: there the tender orphan hands Felt at my heart, and seem'd to charm from thence The wrath I nursed against the world."

And in "Locksley Hall," the "baby fingers, waxen touches" are a far stronger rival to the lover than the man who took away his love. Whether before he writes "The Princess," or after, motherhood, and next to that, wifehood, is Tennyson's ideal of womanhood. From countless passages we learn the importance, the sacredness of a mother; and to a mother's love he concentrates the highest effort of his tragic and lyrical genius—"Rizpah."

We have anticipated a little, but it was with the purpose of showing that when Tennyson took up the great Woman's Rights question, he was likely to deal with it temperately:

> "Turning to scorn, with lips divine, The falsehood of extremes," a quotation, we may add, which can hardly be repeated

"Her office there to rear, to teach. . . ."

In Memoriam, xl.

To this it may be added that the line

"Who loved one only, and who clave to her," contains perhaps the chief moral teaching of the "Idylls of the King." A further reference to this subject will be found in Chapter XV.

too often. The poet, therefore, will approach the subject from all sides, and with due caution; according to his wont he will express various opinions, and among them his own, through the medium of various characters, in order, as it were, to hear how they sound when falling from the lips of others.

The questionings concerning woman's true position in the economy of nature confront us quite suddenly in Tennyson's poetry. "The Skipping Rope," which was mentioned as being the last of his early sketches of fair women, was given to the public together with "Locksley Hall" in 1842. We have already noticed a passage in this latter poem, "Woman is the lesser man" as one that was uttered only half in earnest; nevertheless it denotes a new attention to the subject; and the passage beginning "Or to burst all links of habit . . .", in which the speaker will withdraw from a society whose women are weakness, and join himself to a healthier savage race, and woo a savage for his bride, is in many respects the counterpart of the plan of Princess Ida. But with this exception "The Princess" of 1847 is the first intimation of the extent to which the subject had occupied the poet's mind. Yet in "Edwin Morris," though not published till 1851, we have such an elementary statement of the question 2 as might justify a surmise that this poem dates earlier than "The Princess."

When a great writer has selected a subject, or has had it forced upon him, he makes himself acquainted with the literature that already bears upon that subject; and thus he usually meets with suggestions for his own plan of treatment. Tennyson was often keenly alive to the burning questions of his day; he could not fail to hear the outcries against injustice to women in the past, and the demand for reparation; and when he had determined to devote his learning and his genius to a consideration of their case, he began by sifting the evidence already brought forward in the pages of literature. For some of the results of his inquiries we may turn to the speech of Lilia in the Prologue to "The Princess": "Ouick answered Lilia;" and her answer was to the following effect: "Women are not such inferior creatures; the marvel is that after 'six thousand years of wrong' they are not much worse; stupid customs still deny space and fairplay to their possibilities of nobleness; their chief want is education. 'It is but bringing up'; prohibition of education is the worst injustice done to them; and that terrible injustice they have suffered at the hands of man. But the time has come when right may sometimes raise its head; women may perhaps take of themselves what men have so unwisely and so ungraciously refused to give. Oh that she could 'build Far off from men a college like a man's:' there she would teach women 'all that men are taught.'" This, and more of the same purport Tennyson would read in his survey of literature; but, as we shall shortly discover, he would also learn, what did not occur to Lilia, that to teach women "all that men are taught" would be far from satisfying the aspirations of a right-minded woman. Passing over suggestions offered by the Spartan customs, by Plato's "Republic," by mediæval writers, and later by Ascham, Milton and others, we meet the first definite College project in The Female Academy of Margaret Cavendish, 1662. Next, Defoe, who whether sincerely or otherwise, was often a notable champion of the weaker cause, may be regarded as commencing the dawn.1 Defoe proposed to establish a College for Ladies where they should learn subjects "suitable to both their genius and their quality." In his "Essay on Projects," 1697, Defoe wrote: "I need not enlarge on the loss the defect of education is to womer nor argue the benefit of the contrary practice; it is thing will be more easily granted than remedied. This chapter is not an essay at the thing, and I refer the practice to those happy days, if ever they shall be, when me shall be wise enough to mend it."

<sup>1</sup> P. 163.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;God made the woman for the use of man," etc. See p. 154.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The Princess," ii, 122,

The great cause continued to find champions; Steel and Addison inaugurated the good work in the eighteent century; progress, though fitful, could be recorded as the century rolled on; and in 1787 the celebrated Man Wollstonecroft began her literary career with "Though on the Education of Daughters." Then, in the very year of Tom Paine's "Rights of Man," she published h Rights of Woman.2 She asks in prose what Shelley ar Tennyson, with equal wisdom, asked in verse,

> "Can man be free if woman be a slave?" Revolt of Islam.

"If she be small, slight-natured, miserable, How shall men grow?"

The Princess.

Or, again, if woman "Stays all the fair young planet her hands," ought not those hands to be trained for the important task? This valuable book set the example o temperate and enlightened treatment of a subject fraug with sensation; but the example of Mary Wollstonecr was not always followed-not even by Shelley, who contribution, however, has a value of its own; and by t time that Tennyson in England shed over it the beauti light of imagination, and Auguste Comte in France strong light of truth, the question had become wellni lost amid darkness of extravagant ignorance.

The scheme of "The Princess," as Tennyson design

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Vindication of the Rights of Women, with Strictures on Political Moral Subjects."

, will probably be discovered if we place a passage in ohnson's "Rasselas" by the side of "Love's Labour's ost." The Princess in "Rasselas" "desired first to earn all sciences, and then proposed to found a college f learned women in which she would preside, that, by onversing with the old and educating the young, she night divide her time between the acquisition and comunication of wisdom, and raise up for the next age odels of prudence and patterns of piety." That Tennyson vailed himself of this hint is almost certain, because a ttle earlier in the context we read, "The princess thought nat of all sublunary things knowledge was the best." Knowledge, so my daughter held, was all in all," says ama; and Tennyson is very careful to point out this istake in Ida's scheme. Again, Ida did first desire for many weary moons" to learn a science, or sciences; in e college were learned women, and Lady Blanche was ne of the "old." In fact this passage, together with Love's Labour's Lost," supplies more than the foundaon of Tennyson's famous College. "The Princess" is a ounterpart in opposites of Shakespeare's play; there the ot turns on the withdrawal from the world of a king and ree lords for the purpose of study; they withdraw for term of three years; they bind themselves not for three ears to see any woman; and a princess and her three dies play very much the same part as the prince and his ompanions in Tennyson's story. Minor resemblances etween "Love's Labour's Lost" and "The Princess" are r too numerous for mention; but no reader should omit notice them.

V. THE STORY.—Except in the case of the numerous ad abruptly-shifting scenes of "Maud," and in that of the one of his less familiar poems, Tennyson's stories may be left to tell themselves. Our purpose in this review of The Princess" will be to consider the story rather than the tell it, to discover the significance of the characters, and point out the more important lessons to be learnt fro

In regard to the main part of the story the establis ment and conduct of the College by the Princess, it wou seem that Ida has been harshly dealt with by comme tators; and harshly and somewhat inconsistently by t poet. She is not really so much to blame as Tennyso for his purpose, intends her to be. She has been accus of rejecting the opinion, the presence, and the support men who wished well to her cause; of trusting to me knowledge for the redemption of women; of regardi the isolation of woman from man as the best method imparting that knowledge to her own sex, and as the or means of re-establishing a just equality with the otl sex. She is further accused-and this is the grave charge-of shutting out the natural affections. Her who scheme for the betterment of women is generally regard as a delusion, a folly, if not a fault.

In order to test the validity of these charges, we will first proceed in the usual way, and merely inquire, "WI do we really learn from the story?" Remembering thour inquiry is a provisional one, we notice that the Princess asked "space and fairplay" for an experime She first took care that her own education should be story in the project, whose age and learning commended them, shaulter project.

But we must now inquire into the origin of that proje what, according to Ida, was to be accomplished for wom and how was it to be accomplished? Of this we ha many accounts in the poem, so many that reference each is impossible; nor do they always agree. But gather from them generally that Ida's view of the p history of women was "six thousand years of wrong in every age and nation; such persistent wro from man that she might well distrust all men; and are for these evils was to be "bringing up," in the words Lilia, or "equal husbandry" in her own words, as oted by Gama.

And now to return to the founding of the college. Ida cured a staff of professors who, as far as we are told, d "no links with men." Lady Psyche seems to be an ception, for she had a brother; but Ida had brothers d a father. Her purpose was to "build a fold" far off om men, and to which no man should be admitted -" on in of death"; that sounds ill, and it must be left for ture notice.

This fold she stored "full of rich memorial;" nothing as omitted that could influence her students for their od.

But they were "not for three years to correspond with me." Without regarding the ambiguous date of Ida's periment, we can point to many an institution of our on times in which rules the same in kind, though perhaps t in degree, for the space of three years, are enforced. ne Princess thought she would obtain better results if the aning influences of her college could win their way witht interruption into hearts that, at the average age of r students, were very liable to receive less favourable pressions elsewhere; and submission to these rules s voluntary. She herself purposed "never to wed." nat was quite her own affair, and she was not the first oman so to purpose. But she merely cautioned her pils against men who "rhyme themselves into ladies yours, and then reason themselves out again"-rogues of canzonets and serenades" -she does not even advise em not to marry; though if the authors of some modern vels had been on her staff, she might well have gone far as that; she first warned them against &quot;Things whose trade is over ladies, To lean and flirt and stare and simper," but she also warned them against the same faults in ther selves; for Shelley's stanza continues:

"Till all that is divine in woman Grows cruel, courteous, smooth, inhuman, Crucified 'twixt a smile and whimper;"

and so the Princess continues

"You likewise will do well,
Ladies, in entering here, to cast and fling
The tricks, which make us toys of men--"

so that, if they did wed, they might make better wive She avows no deliberate intention to isolate woman from man, nor any systematic design of shutting out the affections; her purpose "never to wed" was a grand or spite of the betrothal (which her father had some difficult in recollecting):

"Have we not made ourself the sacrifice?"

and she was ready -she yearned -to face instant death

The Princess might even be pardoned for her apparabelief that mere knowledge would supply all the eleme of the higher education of her pupils; she used Popphrase, "Drink deep," and followed it with words of hipurpose. With such a woman to tend it, the droop flower of knowledge would in due time be changed fruit of wisdom. That is fairly certain from the pronence she gave to art and moral teaching. We have noticed an an earlier chapter that at the opening of Josiah Mason Institute not many years ago, it was matained that Science alone afforded a liberal education it required the genius of Matthew Arnold to prothe contrary. That former doctrine Ida would never hadmitted; for, as was mentioned in the same chapt she dwells on the influence of the sculptor's art; thereafter she urges her students, "Oh, lift your natures up; let your minds be ennobled by looking on these noble works of art; and further, they embody, idealized, all that is noblest in woman." And to this she adds, "Better not be at all Than not be noble." The drooping flower of knowledge has already changed to fruit of wisdom.

Another question now presses for space; what, according to the story, were the weak points in Ida's scheme? Again the accounts vary; and our conclusions must be brief, and hastily gathered up. We may begin with the subject last touched upon-knowledge. In the confession made by the Princess herself towards the end of the poem, we read that she "sought far less for truth than power In Knowledge." That is a very common mistake; Knowledge s a means to an end. Some people rest in the means, as does the "man of science" in "Maud." Ida at present was busied with the means of accomplishing her purpose; but the dream "that once was hers" would soon have 'raised the blinding bandage from her eyes," and bidden her behold the end. In her case the power that knowedge brought would itself have rendered a right use of knowledge possible. But quite apart from this question we must notice the exaggerated tone of all this confession:

"It was ill counsel had misled the girl."

This is inadmissible on many grounds; first because of the same dream that once was hers; and then we have to set against it her own protest that in itself the institution was excellent; that it fell through treachery:

"Had you stood by us
The roar that breaks the Pharos from his base
Had left us rock."

She had "fail'd in sweet humility." This is subject to he same modification; we are tempted to add, in the words of the Prince, "True, she errs, But in her own grand way." She had failed; her labour was but as a "block Left in the quarry"; but it was goodly labour none the less. "There's a downright honest meaning in her," said Arac. The labour was noble, we add.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See p. 27.

Certainly, the girls in the College "murmur'd that thei May was passing"; this is the best justification of the "three years" regulation. After these incidental remark we will quote the chief apparent cause of Ida's failure "She sees herself in every woman else." That is to say had she been supported by others as noble as herself, he

College might have been left "rock."

Our "provisional" inquiry has now been carried fa enough; we have proceeded, as stated at the outset, i the usual fashion, picking up, that is, as we have threade our way through the Medley, facts or statements that recommended themselves to our purpose. The exper ment is now at an end.

Suppose we adopt a different method, and test any on statement by its relation to the rest of the poem; we sha probably be surprised to see what may result from a di regard of the famous but much abused unities of place an time. Ida's stern rule,

"Let no man enter in on pain of death," will serve for the purpose; as an incidental example, it has to be reserved for discussion here. The Prince compare this deadly inscription on the gate to a scarecrow in fruit garden. In our day the comparison might be just But what were these days? Since we cannot identify them, let us put them back in a convenient past; an then we find that the Princess had as much right to tre marauders in this way, as the heroic lady of the Prologu who

"Arm'd her own fair head, And beat her foes with slaughter from her walls."

And she was quite as capable of doing it; and whe one woman could fight, so could more than one. If a parter of her students were half like herself, it was no dle determination "To unfurl the maiden banner of our rights."

But all this hypothesis leads to the conclusion that the College, with its numberless modern concomitants, was established in the same remote past.

The theorem can now be stated thus: "Given an age, egendary or historic, in which women are fighters, in that age they will establish a modern College."

Let us now reverse the theorem. Ida establishes a College for women, quite modern in its essential concomitants. By-and-by-she gets into all sorts of difficulties, and incurs the blame of every critic. But she was placed in those difficulties by a series of circumstances quite neompatible with the founding of the College; a tournament was an impossibility, to say nothing of the "wasps" that "entered the good hive." This, stated as a theorem would be the converse of the former, and would lead us to a similar conclusion. For, as we can form no opinion of Ida's conduct except as it is related to the whole of its environment, and as that environment is an impossibility, it follows that to sit in judgment on Ida's conduct is an impossibility.

If now we put the question, "What brings about Ida's overthrow?" we find ourselves in a position to answer: "It is 'The Medley.'"

And returning for a moment to the popular mode of criticism, and putting the Medley—if possible—aside, we might continue with the reflection that, given space and fair play, the College would have been not a perfect but a useful institution, and that the lady superior was admirably fitted for her post.

This section will conclude with one other consideration, rather an important one, but again to be made irrespective of the real fact, the Medley. We feel that Ida has to plead guilty for very much more than her share. It confessions, as noticed above, were unwarranted; Prince assumes an undue superiority, a patronizing that seems out of place. No wonder Walter should be remarked, "I wish she had not yielded." The fact is the catastrophe, especially as concerns Ida, was not dbrought about; it was convenient to the poet but inevitable to Ida; it was not supported by events.

VI. THE CHARACTERS. Viewed through the obscur of the Medley, the impossibility, that is, of making sit tions tally, the characters, if visible at all, are inconsisted If we grant that they may be dimly outlined, then Ida too heroic for conquest by a love that was underhand, e though that love was the agent of "great nature"; a the Prince is too unheroic to take her sweet hands in though she resigns them to Love rather than to a love Here, we say, is another maudlin man come upon the po stage to show the audience how a woman can rede him! Edith, we have already conjectured, must hi "spent a stormy time" with the "strange" being "Lockslev Hall," Maud's marriage fortunately would made in heaven: Arthur's, unfortunately, was made earth: and Guinevere would have nothing to do with "waste dreams," and so everything went wrong. A now this Prince of shadows, dreams, and weakness, the audacity to talk as follows to a woman who is veril maiden moon-glorifying a clown:2

"Dearer thou for faults
Lived over: lift thine eyes; my doubts are dead,
My haunting sense of hollow shows."

This is exasperating enough; but when we come to insolent condescension of the words

"Approach, and fear not,"

we have lost all patience with the man.

<sup>1</sup> The words of Gama, spoken of Ida.

<sup>2</sup> V. 178, 179.

And we are wrong; it is not the man, but the Medley. What the poet has said and done is one thing, what he eant us to understand is another. But how are we to et at his real meaning? Our best but not very satistory answer is, that his meaning must be sought most equently in the very inconsistencies of his work, and for its reason: the necessity of explanation often gave rise the inconsistency.

For example, the "weird seizures," the "haunting sense hollow shows," is a trait added to the character of the rince in the edition of 1851. And the poet meant it to nphasize the part played by nature in subduing the rincess; also to make the Prince less heroic, and to erve as an apology for his being so; to serve also as an pology for the character of the whole poem; and more specially to make the work of redemption set apart for e Princess more important and more complete, 1 for her reserved the doubtful privilege of making a man of m. If we grant that the Princess is least a woman hen she boldly dares all these male thunderbolts that est gave and then treacherously withheld space and fairay for her scheme, we may also notice that when she is ast a woman so is the Prince least a man-he is "among s shadows," a condition suggestive, according to the ing of the North, of "old women." But then, again, we ave first to accept the important hypothesis that Ida was those occasions least a woman, and this, as we have en already, may be disputed. Therefore when the pet's meaning emerges it is usually from an inconsistency; at even then it may not commend itself to all. Was it fair at Ida should be given over to "an old woman" in order at the reader might understand it was Nature and not e Prince who won her heart?

<sup>1</sup> In regard to these "weird scizures" which are referred to on pp. 62, 63, 3, etc., it is interesting to note that in "The Princess" the poet always eaks of them in contemptuous terms, as befits their dramatic position.

The other characters are less baffling, though now then the same dilenima distorts their features. Cyril, is the incarnation of humorous common sense, display view his "solid base of temperament" perhaps too pla when he is told off for the duty of reminding Ida Love and Nature are more terrible than her strong The speech has nothing in it of Cyril as he appeared merly, except the adroit finish: "Give me it; I will it her." But Cyril was "batter'd" when he spoke, an pleaded out of love. Florian represents the relation between brother and sister, Psyche the more imporrelationship between mother and child; but that s relationship as between Lady Blanche and Me appears somewhat strained, and not on the part of mother alone. Whatever the circumstances, Melissa hardly justified in speaking of her mother as she di perfect strangers, and she ill becomes the part assigned her by the poet, that, namely, of "dragging in" wretched father.

Lady Blanche is Ida's opposite. "Then comes feebler heiress of your plan, And takes and ruins She explains the mistake of the Princess who "sees self in every woman else"; she is a foil against w every nobleness of Ida's sticks fiery off indeed. C opposites are the Kings. He of the North impersor unreflecting brute force, and it colours his view of wo Gama is the impersonation of insignificance and minacy, and his view of women is, like his chara insignificant. He remembers the betrothal of his daus by "The year in which our olives fail'd": and "Swa in lazy tolerance," and beginning with a formal "We confesses, "We remember love ourself In our s youth," as though he had come nigh to forgetting had affected him so lightly. Arac and Ida are h children of a weakling father; but this points to a me unusually noble, from whom all their nobility must en derived—"When the man wants weight the woman kes it up." Arac is Ida in man's form, but only the form great. He illustrates the contention "we are twice as ick," "Were we ourselves but half as good, As kind, as athful," and generally that, other things being equal, The woman is the better man."

It has been suggested already that motherhood, and ext to that wifehood, is Tennyson's ideal of womanhood; aturally, therefore, he will make his ideals govern the sues of the poem. And as one ideal requires a child for a expression, and children are implied in the expression the other, he has introduced Aglaia as the embodiment both. To her, then, as final arbiter all questions must be submitted, and she will adjust or re-adjust all relationities between the contending parties. This is a beautiful tea, to set Nature in their midst in the form of a little hild; and equally beautiful was the poet's kindred idea allowing the voice of Nature to be heard from time to me:

"Between the rougher voices of the men Like linnets in the pauses of the wind."

or the songs, like the little child, breathe of motherhood, ifehood, love; of that love which is the poet's best soluon of the problem he undertook to solve.

VII. THE TEACHING OF THE POEM. Although Tenyson's violation of the Unities compelled a suspension of adgment respecting the sequence of events and the onduct of the principal characters, there is less difficulty a appraising the sentiments expressed by the various peakers, and in assigning his own to the poet. Not the east among the many excellencies of "The Princess" is the skill with which almost the whole history of opinion on the question in hand is distributed among the dramatis derivance. That history might be exhibited in a very interesting form by a series of quotations beginning we the King of the North's "Man is the hunter, woman is game," which takes us back to the customs of cert savage tribes, and ending with Tennyson's own summup of the case in those two speeches' so wise and seeing in their eloquence that men and women of to-dhowever advanced in opinion, will surely learn someth from them; will look, for example, towards the hunbeing of the future, perfect in body, mind, and spirit, twand yet one.

<sup>1</sup> But see also p. 28.

The poem fitly concludes with two other speeches, the first Tennyson describes his ideal woman, and fr what has already been said we may be sure it is the p trait of a mother. It may be compared with Wordswordstanzas, "She was a Phantom of Delight," and w Milton's splendid lines in "Paradise Lost," viii. 546-55

Although Tennyson has not addressed any poem to mother, she is more than once reflected in his verse; a she would be present in his thoughts as he made the wonderful sketch, probably the finest thing in the poor "Happy he With such a mother!" That happin appears to have been Tennyson's; and if it falls to five yet on all men who come after him the picture here drawn confers a possibility—imposes a duty—of happiness a nobleness.<sup>3</sup>

The other and remaining speech, though inconsiste as we have seen, with the story—too patronising, example, as addressed to one "The lifting of whose e and "Dear but let us type them pay

```
```

But later, as in "The Wreck," he seems sometimes to look into the futu

&quot;Dear, but let us type them now. . . . "

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Alone, I said. . . ."

<sup>3</sup> We have seen that Tennyson's women of an earlier date were not learn even in this speech he says deliberately of the ideal woman,

&quot;Not learned, save in gracious household ways."

h is my lord"-is nevertheless appropriate as a conete presentation of the main contention of the poem,

My hopes and thine are one."

"Either sex alone is half itself." These words are and near the end of "The Princess." Tennyson's oughts have all along dwelt rather on the individual d personal aspects of the subject; to its social and litical issues he gives but a passing attention, as in the es

" Millions of throats would bawl for civil rights, No woman named."

The political bearings of the question, such as they were the date, would no doubt be regarded lightly by the et, who may also have implied that a better social strucre would soon and surely rise on improved personal undations. For if woman, already the conservator of ciety, "set herself to man Like perfect music unto noble ords," true marriage will become possible; and true arriage, the poet thinks, means true society. But in our by the social development of woman carries the question ome little distance beyond the limits of "The Princess." Of the various family relationships in the poem that of e father is least distinct. Of the relations of friendship, at between woman and woman is placed in a most unwourable light; and by a curious, if not serious, anomaly, ne poet, who rightly regards "either sex alone" as "half selt," speaks of a friend as "almost my half-self." The nomaly need not be tested arithmetically, nor even its earing on the last speech1 be considered; it will become thically apparent when "In Memoriam" is placed by e side of any poem consecrated by Tennyson to the love f woman. These notes on "The Princess" will therefore lose with a brief inquiry into the poet's position as egards friendship and love, and thus they will form a connecting link between this chapter, whose subject w love, and the next chapter but one, which deals wi friendship.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot; 'Nav. but thee,' I said. . . .

In "In Memoriam" we also meet with the doctrine,

"First love, first friendship, equal powers That marry with the virgin heart:"

but the distinction between friendship and love is essetially real, however much they may at times seem balance or to blend.

The two instincts that impel individuals to supply "fe deficiencies" are the sexual and the gregarious. No roughly speaking, love is a phase-more or less high developed-of the first, and friendship a similar pha of the second. Next, as the sexual instinct is the mo powerful, and the more important in the economy nature, so the higher growths, associations, and sentimen of this instinct are superior to those of the other instinct But the sentiments born of sexual love vary with the age chiefly because the relation of woman to man (most educational) has so greatly varied. And the passion refined friendship preceded that of refined love, owing woman's low position. Higher love, for example, scarce ever existed in ancient times, say among the Greeks and the Latins; hence the appearance of friendship in ancie literature, the many literary monuments to friends in bo ancient and modern literature, and the comparative absence of love. The physical basis upon which tl edifice of love has been built, by no means detracts fro the beauty of that edifice, nor could the mighty passic have risen from any stronger foundation.

We readily admit that even in the same epoch, ar the same nation, and the same social grade, the passic of love will assume many different forms, for these eceptions, if rightly regarded, will support our contention that in love, as generally understood, we recognize the nost entrancing, the most beautiful, the most spiritual, and the most permanent of human emotions. As to "First ove, first friendship, equal powers," Moore may speak for as:

"Who would not welcome that moment's returning When passion first waked a new life through his frame, And his soul, like the wood that grows precious in burning, Gave out all its sweets to Love's exquisite flame."

Of course, first love may also be first friendship, but the case is rare. And we may further admit that the passion of refined friendship does occasionally approximate to the bassion of refined love; yet they can never be equal or dentical. The physical basis of love is to love what the coot is to the tree; and there is no such physical basis in triendship.

If further proof of love's supremacy were needed, we night accept it from Shakespeare, who best of all knew the human heart. Even he for a time (as mentioned in Chapter V.) confused the false love of woman with the true, as when he wrote his "Hamlet"; but to learn Shakespeare's real opinion on the subject we have merely to glance at this list of names—Juliet, Perdita, Helena, Miranda, Katherine, the two Portia's, Mariana, Isabella, Wiola, Rosalind, Julia, Beatrice, Hermione, divine Desdemona, divinest Imogen; or his opinion may be given in his own words:

"Love, first learned in a lady's eyes, Lives not alone immured in the brain; It gives to every power a doubled power, And when love speaks, the voice of all the gods Makes heaven drowsy with the harmony."

Next would come the consideration of the relative importance of love and friendship in the establishment and the economy of society; but for this, as for several other subjects arising out of the poem, especially the social position of women, no space could be found in the present volume,

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER VII.

A LESSON FROM THE LYRICS.

"TEARS, IDLE TEARS."

(From "New Studies in Tennyson.")

From the Lyrics I choose the song, "Tears, idle Tears partly because we do not expect to find much sediment thought where the music has been evaporated out of the species of composition, and partly because so many of the have quoted the three words, "Tears, idle tears," without suspecting their meaning, or without caring to belief that they could have any meaning at all. Yet even the airy structure of song should rest on some solid foundation, and I shall endeavour to show that these simp stanzas may tell us much about themselves that is pleasal and profitable, and may be made to reveal not a little the author's inner life.

But the author must be his own interpreter. This which is so specially true of Shakespeare, is true of a other great poets. For example, we begin our process interpretation in this case by quoting from Tennysor "Timbuctoo" of 1829:

"I have raised thee nigher to the spheres of heaven, Man's first, last home; and thou with ravish'd sense Listenest the lordly music flowing from Th' illimitable years."

Almost the same words, and many kindred thought are to be found in the "Ode to Memory," which probab dates earlier; and in the "Lover's Tale," written, as the poet tells us, in his nineteenth year, we meet with "The Goddess of the Past," "The Present is the Vassal of the Past,"

Past," and more to the same effect. And from these early poems we may turn to the last sweet and sad volume of all, and there, in the very last and most sacred poem of all, "The Silent Voices," we hear "a wind Of memory murmuring the Past."

Now search through the poet's work that lies between these limits, and you will discover almost countless passages suggestive of deep musings and tender broodings over the past—and not the past of human life alone; for many of them are "echoes of some antenatal dream."

Two or three of these passages I will select.\(^1\) The first is a poem published in "The Gem," 1831:

"Oh sad No more! Oh sweet No more!
Oh strange No more!
By a mossed brookbank on a stone
I smelt a wildweed-flower alone;
There was a ringing in my ears,
And both my eyes gushed out with tears.
Surely all pleasant things had gone before;
Lowburied fathomdeep beneath with thee, No More!

From "Locksley Hall" I choose:

"Thou shalt hear the 'Never, never,' whisper'd by the phantom years,
And a song from out the distance in the ringing of thine ears."

Here compare—

"The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds
To dying ears."

Numerous other such comparisons, with explanations, will be given in the larger volume.<sup>2</sup>

1 Others have been noticed in preceding chapters of this book; for example, another passage from "Timbuctoo," p. 62; one from "The Mystic," p. 192; and lines from "A Song," of the 1833 volume, and "A Dream of Fair Women," pp. 137 and 138.

<sup>2</sup> These are not included in the present Handbook; for since the above Commentary was written, the following explanation supplied by Lord Tennyson himself, has been published by Mr. Knowles (* Nineteenth Century,* January, 1893): "All such subjects (idealism, the state of trance, et.) moved him profoundly, and to an immense curiosity and interest about them. He told me that "Tears, idle tears' was written as an expression of such

For the antenatal recollections we may turn to the "Two Voices":

"Moreover, something is or seems, That touches me with mystic gleams, Like glimpses of forgotten dreams, "Of something felt like something here, Of something done, I know not where, Such as no language may declare."

But the most important reference is this, to the "Ancient Sage":

"To-day? but what of yesterday? for oft
On me, when boy, there came what then I call'd . . .
In my boy-phrase 'The Passion of the Past,'
The first grey streak of earliest summer dawn, . . .
Desolate sweetness—far and far away—"

And with that compare:

"What vague world-whisper, mystic pain or joy,
Thro' those three words would haunt him when a boy,
Far-far-away?

·3-

"A whisper from his dawn of life? a breath From some fair dawn beyond the doors of death, Far—far—away?

"Far, far, how far? from o'er the gates of Birth,
The faint horizons, all the bounds of earth,
Far—far—away?" 1

Moreover, this lovely song, "Far—Far—Away" resembles "Tears, idle tears" in many points, and not the least in its strange sweet sad charm.

Next the "In Memoriam" contains many references to the "eternal landscape of the Past." But I refrain from longings. It is in a way like St. Pant's 'greanings which cannot be attered.' It was written at Tintern when the woods were all yellowing with Autumn seen through the rained windows. It is what I have always felt even from a boy, and what as a boy I called the 'passion of the past.' And it is so always with with me new; it is the distance that channs me in the landscape, the picture and the tie past, and not the immediate to day in which I move."

"The Soul . . . cometh from afar."-Wokuswokin's Ode on the Intimations, further quotations from Tennyson, at least until I have called upon one or two other poets to aid me in the work of elucidation:

Wordsworth's "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood" must, of course, be mentioned first. In this we have an eloquent expression of these sweet and sad visions of the past, these yearnings for something better—above us—beyond us—Far, far away:

"It is not now as it hath been of yore . . . The things which I have seen I now can see no more."

This expression no more, which occurs in the refrain of "Tears, idle tears," must detain us here. It is a great favourite with our poets; so is "never more." Poe's account of his selecting the long o as the most sonorous vowel, in connection with the r as the most producible consonant, is over fanciful; but we may readily believe that the refrain "Never more" created his well-known poem; and this is true of refrains generally; they help to build up the lyrical structure.

A good example of this fact may be found in the first song of "The Princess," in which the significant bit of local colouring, "pluck'd the ripen'd ears" (see "Maud," Part II., i. line 3), was suggested by the refrain "with tears." No more appears again in the song, "Ask me no more" ("Princess"), and this latter sentence begins each of five stanzas in a song by Carew. These remarks on the words "no more" must close with two appropriate quotations, one from Byron:

"No more, no more, oh nevermore on me, The freshness of the heart shall fall like dew," and one from Shelley,-

"When will return the glory of your prime? No more—oh never more!"

The poet to be named next to Wordsworth will, equally of course, be the poet last quoted. We might be surthat for such a theme Shelley would supply material both beautiful and abundant, such as is found in the stanzas entitled, "Time Long Past":

"There is regret, almost remorse, For time long past."

Like the influences of love, the poet's rhythms-

"Roll from soul to soul, And grow for ever and for ever;"

and the plaintive waves of Shelley's music seemed to have rolled into the large heart of Tennyson, there to reverberate in echoes strangely sweet, deep, and far.

One other poet to be mentioned in this connection is Henry Vaughan, whose lines "The Retreat," beginning –

"Happy those early days, when I Shined in my angel infancy" have much in common with Wordsworth's Ode. There is also a beautiful stanza in Vaughan's poem, "Beyond the Veil"—

"And yet as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul, when man doth sleep,
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes
And into glory peep."

In this search after the inmost meaning of "Tears, idle tears," we shall not examine the context nor the song itself, for these other two lines of inquiry are important enough to be followed up separately; and they lead to the same conclusion. We may, however, notice that according to the poet, the song "moans about the retrospect;" that it deals not with "the other distance, and the hues of promise." Here, again, reflection lifts the rod to silence feeling; Tennyson chides his Violet much as Shakespeare rebukes a Hamlet, or a Brutus, when they echo some vecret yearning that escaped in music from his soul; and we understand that the author of "The Princess"—partly in his artistic design—will not make any frank admission such as that we have heard in "The Ancient Sage." The transatic purpose of the song—and there is little enough of this—may be discovered in one line of the context, where we are told that some of the girls imprisoned in the College "murmur'd that their May was passing," and we may suppose that Violet gives expression to this regret.

<sup>1</sup> See also his "Speculations on Metaphysics," v. 4.

I do not wish to imply that our great poet is in the nabit of idly and uselessly "moaning about the retrospect;" the rebuke of The Princess, also, is something nore than dramatic, as we may learn from the "Golden Year:"

"Old writers push'd the happy season back,— The more fools they,—we forward: dreamers both!'

But for all this, the past and the far-

"The devotion to something afar From the sphere of our sorrow," the lost, the gone—all these are a passion to him; and a passion that must sometimes seek utterance. It is Wordsworth's case over again:

"To me alone there came a thought of grief;
A timely utterance gave that thought relief,
And I again am strong."

Ode on Intimations.

Deep musings and tender broodings over the past—and not the past of human life alone, for many of them are "echoes of some antenatal dream!" I repeat these words (p. 251), for they suggest our next inquiry; What was there in that past? and what is it that is lost and gone? According to Wordsworth, it is a kind of "celestial light" that "apparelled" all earthly objects until "Shades of the prison house began to close Upon the growin boy."

"Such hues from their celestial urn
Were wont to stream before mine eye,
Where'er it wandered in the morn
Of blissful infancy."

Evening Voluntary, ix.

So it was with Tennyson. He was doomed to lose the light of "the million stars which tremble O'er the deemind of dauntless infancy." He came amongst us, "training clouds of glory"; he became a man, only to see there

"Die away,
And fade into the light of common day."

Ode on Intimations.

And now,

"That type of Perfect in his mind In Nature can he nowhere find. He sows himself on every wind."

Two Voices.

Yet ever and again he exchanges his grown-up Platoni faith for childhood's perfect sight, or the more perfect antenatal vision—as only a poet can.<sup>1</sup>

But I may not do more than touch upon any Platoni element in this marvellous song; I will only trust that the foregoing considerations will now enable us to paraphrase the famous first line—

"Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean."

In prose the author would speak to us thus:

"If you suppose that your poet's regret for the past i not very natural, very deep, and very real, then you know him scarcely at all."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;This glimpse of glory, why renewed?...
Which at this moment, on my waking sight
Appears to shine, by miracle restored."

Evening Voluntary, ix.

"A height, a broken grange, a grove, a flower
Had murmurs, Lost and gone and lost and gone!
A breath, a whisper—some divine farewell."

Ancient Sase.

Ancient Sage.

Here we have the epithet divine of "Tears, idle tears."

"Trailing clouds of glory do we come From God, who is our home."

Ode on Intimations.

"Dreams of the past, how exquisite ye be, Offspring of heavenly faith."

And in these quotations we may possibly find the source that epithet; something also not altogether alien in is:

"What sight so lured him from the fields he knew,
As where earth's green stole into heaven's own hue,
Far—far—away?"

I have done little more than conduct the student-lover for Tennyson to the threshold of this beautiful building of the interior for himself. Therefore I take my leave of the interior for himself. Therefore I take my leave of time with just one parting remark. One of the chief easons for the superlative excellence of "Tears, Idle ears" will be found in the absence of rhyme. This, and specially in so short a composition, gives the poet a great dvantage, and enables him to unite the three elements of thought, feeling, and expression in an equal perfection. To perfect, indeed, are all these, that the absence of the him is not felt, and the poem has a melody of its own, which, as was implied above, is admirably adapted to the nelancholy sweetness of the thought. And the source of

See also pp. 137 and 138.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;But there's a tree, of many, one,
A single field, which I have looked upon;
Both of them speak of something that is gone. . . .
The pansy at my feet
Doth the same tale repeat."
Ode on Intimations.

this melody is found where the brook-like lightne sparkle and passion of the lyric blend with the grastream of blank verse.<sup>1</sup>

And now, little song, what shall be my word of farew to you? I trust that you are very precious to all who re you, or sing you, or muse upon your silent music. It were Shelley, I should "bid them own that thou beautiful"; or if I were the laurelled singer who sang y with such ineffable charm, I might sing again—

"What charm in words? a charm no words could give!
O dying words, can music make you live
Far—far—away?"

<sup>1</sup> This lyrical blank verse may almost be said to have originated w Tennyson; for though it may be found here and there in the poetry of fort poets, they have seldom or never employed it in the definite lyrical form "Tears, Idle Tears," and other songs by the same author. To some of the a reference will be made in Chapter XI., Section IV.

CHAPTER VIII.

ODE ON THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON," AND OTHER POEMS.

OLLOWING "The Princess" in the table of contents, and reaching as far as "In Memoriam," is a long series of oems composed at various times. The first six of these re patriotic or national—"Ode on the Death of the Duke f Wellington," "The Third of February, 1852," "The tharge of the Light Brigade," "Ode sung at the Opening of the International Exhibition," "A Welcome to dexandra," and "A Welcome to Her Royal Highness farie Alexandrovna, Duchess of Edinburgh." Then bllow three of the best of Tennyson's character studies, The Grandmother," "Northern Farmer, Old Style," and Northern Farmer, New Style." The remaining poems of the series do not admit of classification, unless we tention the four philosophical pieces near the end.

(218) "ODE ON THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF WEL-INGTON." The Duke of Wellington died on September 4th, 1852, and Tennyson's Ode was published on the day f his funeral, November 18th. The poet, therefore, would seem to have written in some haste; further, he toiling at a task suddenly imposed upon him. Noth could have been more trying for Tennyson; and the faraft of his "Ode," which appeared as a small pampl of sixteen pages, was certain to place him in an unfavouble light. Other poets of less repute had been fast writers; and so much excellence was expected of laureate by a nation accustomed to his highly-finish poetical work that they were naturally dissatisfied withis hurried performance; nor was the form of the Ode which it was written, at all attractive.

1 "Wages," "The Higher Pantheism," "The Voice and the Peak," Flower in the Crannied Wall."

We have seen that Tennyson's mode of composit was generally slow and elaborate; "Timbuctoo" mi have lost him the Chancellor's medal had he not be able to work upon a poem already written. Have regard, therefore, to all the circumstances, we are surprised that the Ode should have been disappointing that it should have been subject to frequent revision. second edition, considerably altered, appeared in 185 and further changes were made in the poem when it to its place in the "Maud" volume of 1855.

But, in spite of many imperfections, the Ode in original form had considerable merit; and Sir Her Taylor's estimate of the earlier edition may safely transferred to the finished work: "It has a greatne worthy of its theme."

Before attempting to consider the poem more fully, will be advisable to inquire into the nature of its constrution, and to say a few words on the Ode as a form poetry. If we glance through the table of contents in twolume of Tennyson's poems, we shall find that the wo "ode" occurs three times; there are the "Ode Memory," the Ode now under notice, and the "Ode su at the Opening of the Exhibition." What, then, is an or according to Tennyson? It is a short poem that give mour to some personage, real or figurative, or celebrates me event; it is irregular in every detail of structure, ymes, lines, groups of lines; the only element of symetry being a correspondence between movement and yle on the one hand, and emotion on the other, and a territorial observance of the principle pointed out in a revious chapter, of rise, culmination, and decline from the eath of the Duke of Wellington. This "Ode on the eath of the Duke of Wellington" has often been compared to some of the music of Handel; but the comparison is neither very apt nor very just; because in usic the connection between emotion and form is much ore vital, more identical, than it is, or ever will be, in poetry, which is therefore more dependent upon form.

<sup>1</sup> Pp. 52, 60, 127, 128, 135.

The arbitrary character of the symmetrical element in is kind of ode is easily attested by the fact that the poet beys no rhythmic law; he is a law unto himself; and his wn law is indefinitely variable. For example, on revision f his Ode already published, Tennyson added and reected a considerable number of lines; and the point to e noticed is this: that by far the greater number of Iterations were made not for the sake of the rhythm, but or the sake of the sense. The law of rhythm, therefore, nust have been most elastic. On the other hand it will e argued that if the poet succeeds in giving shapely form the mass of his units, however irregular these may be, e has achieved a great poetical success; but we reply hat opinions will differ in regard to the shapeliness of orm; it is always indefinite. And we cannot escape an neasy sense of unusual license allowed to the poet in the onstruction and arrangement of the parts.

This much is certain; these irregular odes are neither ery abundant nor very popular.

Then there are the almost regular Greek odes, built of trophe, antistrophe, and epode, such as Gray mostly wrote. Yet these in their modern manner are scarcely more pleasing; chanted on the dancing stage of the Greeks they were delightful; but, shorn of their wings music, vocal and instrumental, even the words of Pindhave lost much of their ancient power; and in the page of English literature the so-called Pindaric Odes are found formal; they usually look as if built by rule and line and not by the creative energy of musical emotion.

As to the third class of odes, those that are compos of similar stanzas, like most of the Odes of Horace, like Collins' "Ode to Evening," they either need not called odes at all, or we may also give the name to su lyrics as Tennyson's Horatian lines to Maurice,

With the aid of this digression we may now review t structural aspects of Tennyson's Ode. The movement first, especially in 3 and 4, is like the tread of mourner but from time to time it quickens, till the short lines—

"In full acclaim,
A people's voice"

at the end of 6, are breathless with an impetuous rapidity from the opening of the 7th till the close, the march of the measure is often stately and slow. Next, the rise and for of emotion may be likened to the coming and the departing storm. In the first three divisions the thunder mutter distant and low; in 4 and 5 it becomes louder and neares at the end of 6 the storm has reached its height;

"With honour, honour, honour to him, Eternal honour to his name;"

it gradually declines in 7 and 8, but not without some low recurrent peals as at the end of 8—

> "With honour, honour, honour to him, Eternal honour to his name;"

then in 9 it passes away, softly moaning itself to rest.

There is yet another characteristic of the ode, which abundantly illustrated by this one of Tennyson's. The sentiment will usually be noble and sustained, and the yle ornate and dignified. Tennyson's work, as in "The rincess," is often overloaded with ornament and disgured by traces of effort or straining after effect; but lesse faults are almost transfigured in an ode like the resent, which is majestic rather than inspired or pasonate, and adorned with all the accessories of funeral omp and national ceremony.

It might be supposed that before approaching his subict, Tennyson would refer to the literature of ode and legy; the well-known opening of the sixth division, there Nelson is represented as asking, "Who is he that bometh like an honoured guest?" may be due to Tickell's nes on the death of Addison,

the death of Addison

" Ne'er to these chambers, where the mighty rest, Since their foundation, came a nobler guest."

But more would have been suggested by the panegyric opems of Claudian, from which, in his speech on the ocasion of the Duke's death, Disraeli quoted the line, Venerandus apex et cognita cunctis canities," which ppears in Tennyson's Ode as "O good gray head which all men knew."

(221) "THE THIRD OF FEBRUARY, 1852." This is one of three patriotic poems contributed by Tennyson' to "The Examiner" early in 1852, the other two being "Britons, guard your own" (Jan. 31st), and "Hands all Round" (Feb. 7th). They were called forth by the action of Louis Napoleon, who on the 2nd of December in the preceding year had converted himself from President to Prince-President of the French Republic—or, rather, of a military despotism—and this in a manner that was underhand, selfish, and cruel. Both Lord Palmerston and Lord J. Russell thought it advisable to maintain friendly relations with the new French constitution, although the subject was made the occasion of a dispute between them; a Tennyson's poem refers to a debate on the question in House of Lords. It was natural that Tennyson shot regard the third Napoleon with distrust, for he was knot be possessed of a vulgar ambition to imitate the care of his great uncle, the first Napoleon. Moreover, a loneglect had rendered the defences of England weak at points:

<sup>1</sup> Under the Arthurian nom de blume of." Merlin."

"Easy patrons of their kin Have left the last free race with naked coasts,"

When in the poem Tennyson calls war "this Frence god," he has set his thoughts on Bonaparte, who had mo than once made war on land merely to gloss over a defeat sea. In the same stanza the line, "We dare not every by silence sanction lies," resembles the language hemploys in "Maud," where he speaks of the Czar as "giant liar." At that later time we were in league with the French Emperor, an arrangement in regard to whice Tennyson was nevertheless silent, for, as might be gathere from his sonnet on Poland, his hatred of Russian depotism was yet greater.

The poet's views of war and politics are much the sam in this poem as in "Maud"; there we hear of "Peace i her vineyard—ycs! but a company forges the wine," line which may be compared with the second stanza of this poem. His opinion, "O fall'n nobility" (and the whole of stanza 6), is expressed in some lines omitted is later editions of "Maud"—

"What use for a single mouth to rage
At the rotten creak of the State machine,
Though it makes friends weep and enemies smile
That here in the face of a watchful age
The sons of a gray-beard-ridden isle
Should dance in a round of old routine,
While a few great families lead the reels,"

In the chapter on "Maud" reference is made to the "niggard throats of Manchester" in the last stanza.

(222) "THE CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE." The st two lines of the former poem are a fitting introduction the stirring Balaclava lyric:

"And these in our Thermopylæ shall stand, And hold against the world this honour of the land."

is magnificent, but it is not war: and we are well ontent that it should be only magnificent, for by such agnificence England became great. And peace is deed desirable and not war, nor the song of war; but y war we were welded into a nation; there was no other ay, whatever may be the way of the future. "No riting of mine," says Tennyson, "can add to the glory ey have acquired in the Crimea"; but we must not equiesce in the laureate's modesty; the glory of warrior ever found a lovelier or a truer helpmeet than the glory song; and in order to correct the poet's estimate we ave only to inquire, " Is there any Englishman who would ish Tennyson's 'writing' to be unwritten?" And lastly, may have been a blunder, and the blunder gets into the oem, but-and these again are Tennyson's words: "It one for which England should be grateful, having learnt nereby that her soldiers are the bravest and most obedient nder the sun."

"The Charge of the Light Brigade" appeared in the Examiner" for December 9th, 1854, with the following ote: "Written after reading the first report of 'The limes' correspondent, where only 607 sabres are menioned as having taken part in the charge." Next, it was necluded, with several alterations, in the "Maud" volume f 1855. Soon after this it was printed on a quarto sheet of four pages; at the end was a letter by the author, from which an extract has already been made. The first senence is as follows:

"Having heard that the brave soldiers before Sebasopol, whom I am proud to call my countrymen, have a iking for my Ballad on the 'Charge of the Light Brigade,' at Balaclava, I have ordered a thousand copies of it to printed for them."

This popular poem, which should be compared w Drayton's "Agincourt," is a little open to criticism; I those it honoured are nearly all among the dead; a comments, however numerous and elaborate, might end with the remark that it is a glowing tribute to militar glory, for which, both the tribute and the glory, a who nation may well be thankful.

(223) "ODE SUNG AT THE OPENING OF THE I TERNATIONAL EXHIBITION." This is one of the best Tennyson's official poems. In spite of the distrust commerce and peace due to the war fever in "Maud"—

"No longer shall commerce be all in all, and Peace Pipe on her pastoral hillock a languid note," the merchant ship is here "the fair white-winged peace maker"; and the fifth section, in which these words occurecalls the enthusiasm of "Locksley Hall" (61, 64) at the trembling hope of "The Golden Year," as expressed in the last two stanzas of Leonard's song, "Fly, happ happy sails." Yet more tremulously the same hope repeated in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" (83, 84 And if the day for which Tennyson waited is yet "so fa away," he has surely brought it nearer. If there is an thing in poetry that must enter into the heart of even man who hears it, and beat with his blood, it is sure such lines as these:

"Ah! when shall all men's good Be each man's rule. . . ."

Golden Year.

"Till each man find his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood."

Ode sung at the opening of the International Exhibition.

"Follow Light, and do the Right. . . . . . . Love will conquer at the last."

. . . Love will conquer at the last."

Locksley Hall Sixty Years After.

The "Ode" was sung at the opening of the International Exhibition, May 1st, 1862. In June it was printed a "Fraser's Magazine." In earlier editions the divisions ere not numbered, and the fourth division ("Is the goal of far away?") was not included. This added portion expeats the lesson of "The Golden Year"; but it is urther one of the many instances in which the poet hooses to temper enthusiasm with doubt.

(223) A WELCOME TO ALEXANDRA, March 7, 1863, rinted by Edward Moxon as a sheet of four pages, was old among the crowd. The five lines beginning, "Rush o the roof . . ." were added later. With other emendations it appeared in the "Enoch Arden" volume of the ollowing year.

(224) A WELCOME TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS MARIE ALEXANDROVNA, DUCHESS OF EDINBURGH, March 7, 1874. This, like the former, was printed on a single sheet; later it appeared in "The Times." It is not so spirited as the preceding; there is less of stirring poetry, but it has wisdom enough to make it a welcome addition to the collection of laureate poems.

(225) THE GRANDMOTHER. Browning seeks unfamiliar types of character; Tennyson paints those that are familiar. Browning's sketches are striking by reason of novelty and complexity, the difficulty involved in delineation, the intellectual strength and acuteness by which the difficulty is overcome. Tennyson's portraits are admirable because of their perfection; as usual with him, he chooses the simpler, less complicated subject, but he deals with it so elaborately, and leaves it so carefully finished, that his work is often more pleasing and more valuab than that of Browning. For one reader who appreciat "Caliban upon Setebos," there are perhaps a thousar who know such a poem as "The Grandmother" with knowledge that is akin to affection.

This admirable study appeared under the title of "TI Grandmother's Apology" in "Once a Week" for July 16t 1859. It was accompanied by an excellent illustration I Sir J. E. Millais. In 1864 a place was found for it is

"Enoch Arden and other Poems."

(228) and (231). THE NORTHERN FARMER-OL STYLE AND NEW STYLE. These again are admirable studies; in their rougher naturalness perhaps mor striking than "The Grandmother." But they appear t be somewhat disguised under their garb of dialect; w cannot always tell where drapery ends and statue begins We are sure of the men when we see them; we ar uncertain about their speech; it claims an undue atter tion; there is something of artifice in the sound of i The exactness of imitation need not be called in question indeed, the Irish dialect in "To-morrow" may b regarded as equally exact, and it ought to be equallfamous; but it is exposed to the same objections. B comparisons innumerable the reader can judge of the poet's literary language; he cannot judge of this; he only knows that it gives the artist an unlimited means o covering the face of weakness with the mask of strength as he expresses the character through an unfamiliar and variable medium. The poet knows this too; and just as the elocutionist will choose a piece in dialect to begin with, in order that he may gain confidence in himself and his audience, so the poet feels more secure with this dis guise of dialect ever at hand.

Next, the medium is not natural to the poet; he has not mastered it; he must evolve it separately while he draws is character, and to the detriment of the drawing. In ne proof sheets of "The Northern Farmer," Tennyson nade a very large number of corrections; and this was artly because of the strange raiment of speech in which e was dressing up the figure. But the most important onsideration, already hinted at above, is stated more ully in Chapter I. under the head of Humour. Our ttention is divided between the character and its environnent, for we feel that, under existing conditions, the enironment is something apart from the character; we are ware that the poet has failed to create it in any vital connection with the character; he would not think out his character in dialect; some at least of the dialect could be stuck on afterwards; and we are further aware that he rusts to it separately to produce an impression.1 In the same way it is easier to draw a humorous than a serious character, and a comic character is easiest of all. Shakespeare, therefore, begins with comic characters; he creates Launce, and Bottom, his earlier Falstaff, and Falstaff nimself, at least before he finishes Hamlet; but Hamlet he never finished. Nor was it until his powers were fully matured that he brought Iago on the stage.

(233) "THE DAISY." This tender and delightful poem of the "Maud" volume of 1854 tells us how the poet while in "the gray metropolis of the North," found between the leaves of a book a daisy gathered by him on the Splugen in 1851. He was then travelling abroad with his wife, whom he had married the year before, and this finding of the daisy gave the poet an opportunity of going over the foreign scenes again in his lightly moving verse. Other reminiscences of continental travel sketched with the same swift grace, occur in "In Memoriam." "The rich Virgilian rustic measure Of Lari Maxume" is e plained by a reference to Virgil's Georgics, ii. 159.

<sup>1</sup> Hence it would appear that poems in dialect scarcely come within the province of literary art; and only a brief notice can be assigned to them in this Handbook.

(234) "TO THE REV. F. D. MAURICE." The Re Frederick Denison Maurice, who had been one of Tenn son's friends at Cambridge, and is sometimes known the founder of the Broad Church School, had recent been obliged to resign his professorship in King's Colle, because of the undisguised liberality of his religio opinions. Hence the lines, "Should eighty thousar college councils," etc. Tennyson, who hated intolerant of all kinds, sent to Maurice by way of sympathy the characteristic letter, which is dated January, 1854. The stanza employed in this and the former lyric is light at musical; and the easy grace and superb finish of the poem itself suggests a comparison with Horace, even before we note the many turns of thought where Horace blends with Milton."

(235) "WILL" (1854). Here also are thoughts fro Horace, Odes, III. iii.—the first eight lines; and the figu "who seems a promontory of rock . . . "will be four in the tenth book of the Æneid, 693-696. The line Shakespearian elements in the second stanza, "Or seen ing-genial venial fault" can hardly escape censure as bein over fanciful, although the sound was doubtless intende to emphasize the sense. The chief merit of this formles but sturdy little poem seems to be the remarkable figur at the end of it, which, apart from the suggestion of rhyme for "fault," is likely to have a history. Compar with this poem "All Life needs for life is possible to will; also Smiles' variation of Addison:

"'Tis not in mortals to deserve success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll command it,"

<sup>1</sup> Sonnets to Mr. Lawrence and Cyriack Skinner.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;So seeming just," "a venial slip." 3 "Love and Duty."

(235) "IN THE VALLEY OF CAUTERETY." In this nournful and tender prem we have the reminiscence of nother continental tour. In 1861 Tennyson revisited the yrenees, and stayed at Mont Dore-les-Bains, Cameretz. nd other places with his wife and children. Not long efore, Arthur Clough had set out i'r the same pams search of health. The following extracts from his diarv re profoundly but mournfully interesting. "September st :- The Tennysons arrived at 6.30 yesterday. Tennyon was here with Arthur Hallam thiny-one years ago. nd really finds great pleasure in the place : they stayed ere and at Cauteretz. 'Enone,' he said, was written n the inspiration of the Pyrenees, which stood for da.

"September 6. Tennyson and -- have walked on o Cauteretz, and I and the family follow in a mitthe it two.

"Cauteretz, September 7. I have been out for a walk with A. T. to a sort of island between two waterfalls, with pines on it, of which he retained a recollection from his isit of thirty-one years ago, and which, moreover, furnished a simile to 'The Princess.' He is very fond of his place, evidently."

The scene brings back the time : two and themy years roll away like a mist, and Arthur Hallam is with him in the valley once again; his voice is heard in the stream.

in all sounds, all silence of the deepening night.

235 "IN THE GARDEN AT SWAINSTON." Swainston. in the Isle of Wight, was the seat of Tennyson's friend. Sir John Simeon, who is said to be the Sir Walter Vivian of "The Princess." It was in the garden at Swainston and under one of its cedar trees that "Mucd was partly metten. In 1840 Sir Tripp Simerin died at Frih ung: and Tennyson, while walking in his garden, gives him the minionality of a great poet's loving verse.

(235) "THE FLOWER." In this fable we read of Te nyson's "flower of poesy," which, according to the poe was "little cared for;" at least, until it found mar imitators. "Once in a golden hour," may be compare with "The poet in a golden clime was born." Tennyso like Wordsworth and Milton, had lofty ideas of the poet office, but his expression of those ideas is not always to lofty as theirs.

(236) "REQUIESCAT." Spite of the stock phrase "its place," the pathetic simplicity and sweetness of the stanzas may almost remind us of Wordsworth's "Lucy,"

(236) "THE SAILOR BOY." These were the only versipublished by Tennyson in 1861, the year in which I visited the valley of Cauteretz; and possibly they we written on the voyage. They appeared at Christmas the "Victoria Regia," a volume of miscellanies edited I Emily Faithful. "The Sailor Boy" adds another to the long list of sea poems that date back to a time when or race was being rocked in its cradle, the sea; and it do honour to the daring and the pluck of the sea-rulin nation. It may further be regarded as an allegory "Death is sure To those that stay and those that roam; which is like Shakespeare's "Will come when it women." Without laying further stress on this precept the poem, we may add Longfellow's "Let us then be a and doing With a heart for any fate."

(236) "THE ISLET." From the first this poem has in mediately followed "The Sailor Boy," and it is mostly all gorical: This "little Eden on earth that I know" is "a fe Eden of the purple East... The winged storms... leave azure chasms of calm Over this isle... heavy with he scent of lemon flowers . . . I have vowed Thee to be ady of the solitude . . . We shall be one . . . Within that calm circumference of bliss." To these rapturous dreamngs of Shelley Tennyson seems to make reply; "Even as dreams they are unworthy; most unworthy of the high possibilities and the sacred duties of waking life."

<sup>1</sup> As (in Tennyson) "I will grow round him in his place,"—Fatima. "The flower ripens in its place."—Lotos-Eaters.

A literal rendering would be something as follows: Dwelling apart by ourselves, seeking only our own happiness, may be likened to solitary existence on a beautiful sland in the tropics; where the real work of life is suspended; where the only music is the false note of the mocking bird, and where loathsome diseases lurk in every profusion of loveliness. Like "The Voyage," this slighter poem is an occasion for vivid sketches of far-off sle and ocean.

In the original volume ("Enoch Arden") "The Islet" was followed by "The Ringlet." This poem amongst others was implied on a former page,1 where the statement was made that certain weaknesses could be traced from the beginning to the end of Tennyson's poetical career. "The Ringlet," which was of the "Skipping Rope" character, but a better poem, was withdrawn some few years ago.

(237) "CHILD-SONGS." Both these songs were contributed in 1880 to "St. Nicholas," an American magazine for children. The rhythms of the nursery were never so melodious. But Swinburne's "In a Garden" should be compared with all other verses written for or about the very young.

(237) "THE SPITEFUL LETTER" ("Once a Week," January, 1868). In smart repartee, clever satire, easy banter-all combined with loftiness of thought and grace of manner-this poem in its present greatly improved form should stand unrivalled. But Virgil could not he written such. The stanzas are addressed to no one particular; they may be left to us as a lesson: but, a all, a better lesson is to be learnt from the next poem.

<sup>1</sup> Pages 53 and 54.

(237) "LITERARY SQUABBLES" (originally entited afterthought"): 1

"The noblest answer unto such Is perfect stillness when they brawl."

"The silent stars" are the stars of "Maud" and Lucretius that "burn and brand His nothingness man." The epithet "stony" reminds us of the "Av Memnonian countenances calm" of "A Fragme "Lethe, the river of oblivion, rolls His watery labyrin in "Paradise Lost." These verses were written in Ma 1846, as an "afterthought" to "The New Timon and Poets," in which Tennyson a week previously had reto upon Lord Lytton, who had attacked him in his p

(238) "THE VICTIM," accompanied by an illustral appeared in "Good Words," January, 1868. Longfer visited the laureate at Farringford about this time, and a coincidence the ballad has something of Longfell manner, especially in the variable metre; but posses nevertheless, a poetic power of its own.

(239) "WAGES" was contributed to "Macmillan's gazine" for February, 1868, and was afterwards include the "Holy Grail" volume. The new dress of this old's of philosophy is not over-poetical; among other de the breaks in the first stanza are perplexing. The se stanza is better. We may extract the material from Memoriam," lxxv. (3), lxxiii. (3 and 4), xxxiv. (1), lxxv. In "Parnassus" the poet is not content to be "Paid w ice flying by to be lost on an endless sea;" in spite of "A d astrology, the boundless plan," he believes that the bet's voice will sound for ever and ever; and that is what asks for as the poet's "glory." It is the same with virtue; ke the charm "for ever" from her, and she crumbles to dust; but she desires no vulgar immortality of intion; she demands as her meed eternal activity. Tenvson does not believe, like George Eliot, that virtue is er own reward "even here, But for one hour." 1

<sup>1</sup> See also p. 195.

(239) "THE HIGHER PANTHEISM," read previously efore the Metaphysical Society, was published in the Holy Grail" volume. This with the preceding and the o following poems forms a philosophical group.

It has already been stated 2 that the doctrine of evoluon could not fail to be a potent influence with Tennyon; and on another page3 will be found an incidenta mark to the effect that scientific thought is again making god of nature. Before considering Tennyson's "Higher antheism," it will be necessary to add very briefly that any earlier religions and philosophies regarded man as ne with nature; that the Christian religion has kept them together apart, regarding nature as something made for nan's convenience, yet often a harmful thing, to be nunned, or dominated, or despised; and, lastly, that ne intellectual ingenuity of the nineteenth century has rought them nearer together than they ever were.4 But ne first tendency of modern scientific inquiry was to eave the conception of the deity to religion whether ogmatic or emotional, while it gradually evolved man om his surroundings, and constituted him an integral part of the material universe, all whose operations we found to be one with law. Later, when science carrits spirit of inquiry into the theological field, it showe tendency to identify its god of Law with the God theology; and theology at the same time expressed so willingness to meet science half way—

<sup>1 &</sup>quot; In Memoriam," xxxv. 2. 2 See p. 26. 4 Some conjectures on p. 37 (footnote) respecting the relationship between nan and his environment may seem plausible as far as man is concerned. part from man, what was his environment might be likened to the number hree, if that number, after measuring three apples, sought to maintain unymbolized its measuring potentiality?

" For if He thunder by law, the thunder is yet His voice."

Here then is the "Higher Pantheism," a compron between a strictly scientific conception of our cosmoge and the emotional instincts and convictions of the hig philosophic and religious minds; and Tennyson end yours to show that the path of induction and the path intuition converge near the forests of the infinite to bound us in.

Once more, therefore, we see Tennyson in that position of arbitrator which the leading poet of an age like of must almost inevitably assume. That he should know his own mind when closely questioned on such significant in the should seek to know the unknown able and express the inexpressible is sometimes lauda sometimes admirable, sometimes disastrous; for here are dealing with poetic art. It is fairly laudable in "Higher Pantheisin," entirely admirable in "The Anc Sage," but most disastrous in "De Profundis."

(240) "THE VOICE AND THE PEAK." This is ano attempt to find a voice for the ineffable, and to aphend the infinite. The sentiment is often to be with in "In Memoriam"; as, for example, in Poem cx. we get no nearer heaven by climbing to the Peak—"That not gained a real height." 2

Therefore when the appeal for some knowledge of Infinite goes up from river and ocean, to the Peak

<sup>1</sup> Cabinet edition, 1874.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;The Two Voices."

ands so high above them, the poet makes the Peak ply: "The hills are shadows, and they flow From form form, and nothing stands." But, he adds, speaking for mself, the material universe is finite, man is infinite; s thoughts wander through eternity; "Eternal process oving on, From state to state the spirit walks." This ew of nature is different from that of "The Higher antheism" which seems to confess with Pope, as also ith "In Memoriam," cxxix. and cxxx.:

> " All are but parts of one stupendous whole Whose body nature is, and God the soul," view, it may be added, which accords more exactly with any of the conclusions of modern science. Evolution as first unified science, and secondly, unified the universe. ll we are certain of, says Huxley, is the fact of conciousness, thought; to this evolution adds we may put in the words of Shelley-thought is the measure of e universe; that is to say, every product of developent stands in a close relation to every other product; nd, given the fact of thought in any one manifestation of e infinite making of the frame of things, then every other anifestation is a form of thought; in the more highly rganized product, thought is more highly organized;2 hereas some simpler consciousness of which we can form o conception may be present in the most elemental conituents of what we call matter; "I swear I think now that verything has an immortal soul."3 From this point of view e may better understand how it was that to Wordsworth Il nature seemed alive as a form or mode of thought.

(240) "FLOWER IN THE CRANNIED WALL," has been onsidered on p. 38. Like some others of the philosophial pieces, it is formless, and rather unpoetical, although earnest and impressive. The thought occurs in mar other writers, both ancient and modern, and from or point of view may be compared with the well-known linof Wordsworth:

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," lxxxii. 4 "Holy Grail" vol., 1870.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," lxxxv. 6-7, and Epilogue 36.

<sup>3</sup> Whitman.

> "To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

In this little poem we have at its best one of Tennyson later favourite phrases, the Wordsworthian "all in all."

(240) "A DEDICATION." This poem was printed ne the end of the "Enoch Arden" volume; and is obvious not explicitly, addressed to the poet's wife. So also t dedication of "The Death of Enone and Other Poem is without a name. As these lines testify, it was a marria of true minds when Alfred Tennyson wedded Em Sellwood, and almost to be compared with the union Robert Browning with Elizabeth Barrett.

(241) "EXPERIMENTS." This title groups together t five poems that follow.

(241) "BOADICEA." By adapting a metre of Catull the poet has written what are, perhaps, the most sonord lines in our language. He takes occasion to prophesy future greatness of England, especially in the passa beginning "Thine the liberty." As in some of the ver of "Maud" and "The May Queen," the accents, eight each line, become the basis of the measure, more or l irrespective of the number of syllables.

(243) "ON TRANSLATIONS OF HOMER." The substart of a remark made in a former chapter will be the lapreliminary comment on this and the following two excises in Quantity; they prove that the poet felt how difficults to the control of the control of it was to force the classic metres into English, but prove also that if it could be done, he could do it. Further, whatever they may have that is classical will be chiefly or only their form.

These "Attempts at Classic Metres in Quantity" first appeared in the "Cornhill Magazine" for December, 1863.

(243) "MILTON." These lines are indeed worthy of their theme, though that is among the highest. The best way to appreciate them is to know "Paradise Lost" by heart. To that poem alone does the poet make any reference; and it is strange, that some critics should rank "Comus," and other minor poems of Milton, with his great Epic, to which they present no prominent feature of comparison. Although so many poets and poems may put forward a claim to the place of honour in Tennyson's favour, we may venture to mention, in this connection, that if there is one poem more than another to which the late laureate was indebted, that poem is probably "Paradise Lost." The poet singles out the two important aspects of the great Epic, "Strength and beauty met together;" he prefers the beauty, but the two and if only Tennyson had possessed more of Milton's strength, he would have been a much greater poet. The Alcaics end in Tennyson's favourite manner, with exquisite imagery wrought into music that has a "dying fall." It may be compared with "In Memoriam," laxxvi. (4).

"Kindle their image like a star In a sea of glassy weather;"

(243) Hendecasyllabics call for little more than the remark referred to above.1 Though these lines are more genial than usual, and merely an "experiment," they are not attractive.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;On Translations of Homer,"

(243) "SPECIMEN OF A TRANSLATION OF THE ILIA IN BLANK VERSE." The following prefatory note woriginally printed above this fragment: "Some, as among these one at least of our best and greatest, ha endeavoured to give us the 'Iliad' in English hexameter and by what appears to me their failure, have gone far prove the impossibility of the task. I have long held lour blank verse in this matter, and now after havin spoken so disrespectfully here of these hexameters, venture, or rather feel bound, to subjoin a specimen, however brief and with whatever demerits, of a blank vertranslation."

On the difficult subject of translation in general a no will be given in the Chapter on "Maud." Meanwhile may be stated that opinion will differ as to the advisabili or the possibility of translating Homer, the metre to be employed in any such attempt, and so forth. But the me presence of this specimen, as well as the specimen itse is open to some criticism. It will perhaps be sufficient add that Tennyson's rendering of this famous passage have been greatly improved since its first appearance, that it more successful than his "Achilles over the Trench," are that most of the notes of earlier versions have been wise withdrawn.

(244) "THE WINDOW; OR, THE SONG OF TH WRENS." When, in 1867, Tennyson was staying with S Ivor Bertie Guest at Canford Manor, Wimborne, this litt cantata, or song-cycle, written for Sir—then Mr.—Arthu Sullivan's music, was printed at Sir Ivor's private press.

These songs, composed "German fashion," and twelve in number, are a fanciful and most musical story of wooing; and in their variety, and adaptation to mood an incident, they bear some slight resemblance to the lyric of "Maud,"

ADDENDA TO CHAPTER VIII.

This chapter will close with a mention of some minor verses dating a few years later than the middle of the century, and not included in Tennyson's published works.

A poem of 1852, "Britons, guard your own," has been noticed on p. 263.

On the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal, January 25th, 1858, the poet added two stanzas to the National Anthem. These were printed in "The Times" of January 26th.

On March 19th, 1864, he contributed to "The Court Journal" a short "Epitaph on the Duchess of Kent." It was afterwards inscribed on Theed's statue at Frogmore.

The "Enoch Arden" volume of 1864 included "The Ringlet," which has been noticed incidentally on page 273.

"Home they brought him slain with spears," was printed in a volume of Selections in 1865. It is a good song of two stanzas, allied in subject to "Home they brought her warrior dead."

In 1868 there appeared in the March number of "Good Words" a poem entitled "1865-1866." It consisted of thirteen lines, beginning,

"I stood on a tower in the wet. . . . " 1

As was noticed in a previous chapter, the poem is a poor one, and it presents a striking example of intense emotion failing utterly to find appropriate poetical expression. Yet its leading thought, which was partly quoted on a former page, possesses deep interest for all who would know the inner life of our great poet.

CHAPTER IX.

"IN MEMORIAM," 1850.

I.—INTRODUCTORY. Among the greater poems of Tennyson, "In Memoriam" holds a high position. It is best known and best loved; the wiscst, the most spiritual, often the most beautiful. It is one of the greatest poems of the nineteenth century.

To realize its importance we have only to ask ourselves, "What would our life and thought from 1850 to 1895 have been without it?" In this respect of influence, "In Memoriam" takes rank with some of the leading productions of literary genius; it mingles with the speech of our daily life; it is sung in our hymn books, and preached with our sermons: it infiltrates the higher literature of more than forty years; it has been translated into other languages; it is referred to or quoted by a very large proportion of the best books, scientific as well as imaginative, that have been published since its appearance. So much, indeed, has it been drawn upon, whether for purposes of illustration, or authority, or adornment, that a speaker or writer of good taste in the present day will scarcely venture to quote its apt, familiar, and well-loved lines.

<sup>1</sup> One instance, and of quite a recent date, would be "Problems of the Future." by S. Laing, 1893. This work, properly scientific, has many references to "In Memoriam"

As a work of literary art, therefore, it stands very high amongst us.

But hardly less important is what we may perhaps call its private influence:

"True sorrow then is feelingly sufficed When with like semblance it is sympathized," says Shakespeare; but it is the sympathy of a great heart that suffered as lesser hearts could never suffer, which has endeared "In Memoriam" to thousands of mourners throughout the world:

"O wheresoever those may be Betwixt the slumber of the poles,
To-day they count as kindred souls,
They know me not, but mourn with me" (xcix.).

And the great heart of Tennyson was one of those that "mourn in hope." 1

Further, it is popular as embodying many phases of religion and philosophy, especially such as seem best adapted to the extended and varying needs of our nineteenth century.

Moreover, from a merely artistic point of view, we must regard, as a crowning excellence, those marvellous lyrical outbursts (Poem lxxxvi. is the very finest) that every now and then are heard above the long "monotone of pain."

To sum up, "In Memoriam" is a great work of art, the truest and the most beautiful representative of its age, and at the same time it is one of the best influences, whether external or internal, by which that age in part, and the age succeeding, have been formed.

II.—FORM AND STRUCTURE. "In Memoriam" consists of 131 separate poems, varying in length from twelve to 120 lines each. These poems, though not sonnets in form, are often sonnet-like in many other respects; in each we have some gem of thought set in a framework of beautiful verse. It will be best to call them poems, and to describe them in the poet's own words as "Short swallow-flights of song, that dip Their wings in tears, and skim away."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The Death of the Duke of Clarence."

This moulding of passing moods into a long series of separate poems reminds us of the sonnets of Shakespeare and others; but Tennyson reserved to himself a not unmixed advantage, that of making his poems long or short as he pleased; he gained freedom, but his poem lost form.<sup>1</sup>

At the head of these 131 poems stands a Prologue, and they are followed by an Epilogue.

Each poem is composed of stanzas formed by placing two rhyming Iambic Tetrameter lines between two others that rhyme. This form of verse, already used with effect by Lord Herbert of Cherbury, is very well adapted to the subject, which is mostly that of subdued but prolonged grief. The four lines sometimes sound like the passing bell, as in lvii. 3, 4.

Yet in the hands of such a master, the verse admits of almost infinite variation; and it may also bring to us the joyous pealing of the Christmas bells, just as the poet heard them ring out from village churches in the undulating landscape round the Lincolnshire parsonage (xxviii. 3).

Or the music of his metre may be made passionate or rapturous, and "long drawn out" by passing without a break from one stanza to another, as in the whole of poems xxii. and lxxxvi. and in the latter part of cxv.

As the rhymes occur very frequently, and the poem is a long one (it contains 2,896 lines), we must be prepared to find them sometimes inaccurate, as when the poet makes port rhyme with report (xiv.); sometimes also they fetter his thought and produce slight obscurity, as in this line,

<sup>1</sup> Probably no other great poem is so seriously deficient in the large composite harmony. Its generally recognized exemplar, a series of the Sonnets of Petrarch, with a few other poems, can scarcely be regarded as a exception. If we ask, "What is the structural unit of 'InMemoriam',' we may get for answer, 'not lines nor stanzas, but poems.' To this we must reply, "That cannot be, for the poems have no common element of form, they are absolutely irregular sections, there is no unity within their variety," See Chapter III. Appendix I.: also pp. 310, 311.

"Tho' truths in manhood darkly join." (xxxvi.)

But these blemishes are unimportant. More serious-if for a moment we regard matter as well as manner-are the occasional lapses into metrical prose, as in liii.; or the contrasts of thought, amounting almost to contradictions, due to that other not altogether unmixed advantage, which "In Memoriam" possesses in common with "The Idylls of the King," viz., the large number of years during which the poem was in course of composition. For this long period wrought many important changes in the poet's mental and spiritual life, and we may fairly assume that poems exxix, and exxx, would not have been written in the same year as xlv. and xlvii. Again, in lxxv., Tennyson determines to attempt no description of his friend's greatness; later on he devotes five poems to the subject (cix.exiii.). But, for all this, and much that might be added, beauty and perfection are so generally present that "In Memoriam" may be considered as a highly-finished work.

III. ITS NATURE. The "In Memoriam" is usually classed among elegies—poems of mourning. As the title "In Memoriam" implies, it may be regarded as a monument to the memory of a friend. But the poem is very much more than this. We may view it in many aspects:

"I weep for Adonais—he is dead! O weep for Adonais!"

These are the opening lines of Shelley's "Adonais"; and in the first paragraph of Milton's "Lycidas" are the kindred words:

"Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime. . . Who would not sing for Lycidas?"

And even in Matthew Arnold's "Thyrsis," "A Monody, to commemorate the author's friend," we read, near the beginning:

"He could not wait their passing, he is dead."

"When Sicilian shepherds lost a mate, Some good survivor with his flute would go. . . . And flute his friend, like Orpheus, from the dead."

In each of these cases we have an avowal that justifies the title "In Memoriam," and each of these lamentations was uttered, as we might say, in a breath, and for the occasion, and each lament bears the sign manual of the writer. But, as applied to Tennyson's poem, the title "In Memoriam A. H. H." might seem almost an afterthought; no less than seventeen years elapsed between the death of Hallam and the unveiling of the memorial, and Tennyson never allowed it to bear his name.

An outpouring of grief for private consolation-

"In words like weeds I'll wrap me o'er, Like coarsest clothes against the cold "- pages from a private diary—in which we read how a strong and noble soul bore the burden of a terrible bereavement; how love never yielded to despair, nor faith to doubt; how a human friendship

"Rose on stronger wings Unpalsied when he met with death—"

such is the first aspect of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and however much the poem may have been built up to the music of the past, it is the aspect with which we shall have to deal.

But we must not expect to find the days or weeks, or even the years of this diary marked off by dates. There is not much of external method in the composition of "In Memoriam." Certainly, commentators generally assign a definite period to the story of sorrow; Mr. Stopford

<sup>1</sup> Especially that of Petrarch. (P. 284, footnote.)

Brooke, for example, tells us that "the poem lasts just two years and seven months." Nothing can be further from the fact. A most casual examination shows us that within the limits of 1833-1850 we can do little more than conjecture as to the date of any poem; and two poems were added after 1850 (xxxix. in 1869, lix. in 1851). To begin with, we cannot tell whether the first Christmas mentioned is that of 1833 or 1834. Certainly it speaks of "A merry song we sung with him Last year." But "last year" might possibly be some time in 1833 prior to the death of Hallam, which took place on September 15th of that year. Again, how could the poems xxviii.xxx., if, as Mr. Brooke says, they refer to the Christmas of 1833, be placed after poem xix., which describes the burial of Hallam, an event that did not take place until January, 1834? Nor can we willingly believe that the author of "Break, Break, Break" and "In Memoriam" would be singing any "merry song" while the dead body of his friend was not yet laid in the grave. Or take the third Christmas, which, according to Mr. Brooke, is that of the year 1835. In the poems dedicated to its memory Tennyson himself tells us, and the Tennysons left Somersby in the year 1837. The third Christmas, therefore, cannot be earlier than that year. It will be better to deal conventionally, not rigidly, with the poems of time and incident; to allow them, like the others, to follow one another in a poetical chronology through this history of sorrow, and always to remember that, with but one or two exceptions, the only reliable dates are 1833-1850.

> "Our father's dust is left alone, And silent under other snows" (cv.):

IV. THE SUBJECT OF "IN MEMORIAM." Arthur Henry Hallam, eldest son of the historian, was born in <sup>1</sup> See also p. 22, foothote.

London on the 1st of February, 1811. In 1828, when nearly eighteen, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge. Here he formed a close friendship with Tennyson, to whose sister Emily he was afterwards betrothed. As young Hallam was himself a poet, and a remarkable man in many other respects, Tennyson's affection for his friend soon deepened into an intense devotion. "Certainly," says a recent writer, "this friendship is beautiful to look upon; its comparative rareness only makes it the more refreshing. This was no mere dining at the same club, no mere smoking of cigars together, no mere joining in the same jollity. Here was a real union of heart and mind, mutual esteem, unselfish sympathy."

This friendship lasted until 1833. On September 15th of that year Arthur Hallam died suddenly while abroad:

"In Vienna's fatal walls God's finger touch'd him, and he slept."

Tennyson was stunned by the blow; but he found consolation in writing this poem, which tells us the story of his great sorrow during the years that followed his friend's death. At first he mourns wellnigh as one that has no hope, for a web seems woven across his sky. Most touching is the picture of the bereaved poet as he approaches the deserted house on a dreary autumn morning (vii.); and if any calm comes to his spirit, it is the calmness almost of despair (xi.). But Hallam died abroad, and his remains were being conveyed by sea to Dover, and during this interval of four months the poet had time and strength to right himself a little. He can bestow a blessing on the ship that is bringing to him one who was more than a brother: and when the sacred dust is at last laid to rest in Clevedon Church, the sternest hour of separation has been so long delayed that the mourner's life does not die within him:

"That dies not, but endures with pain, And slowly forms the firmer mind." Yet in a most perfect lyric of the simpler style (xix.) he enshrines both the sad scene and his own anguish, that sometimes ebbs a little, but oftener fills his heart too full for tears. How often the mourner's heart was too full for utterance we may gather from another beautiful lyric, "Break, break, break," which was probably written about this time. From this point until the 56th poem is reached the poet passes through many phases of sorrow. We see him weeping by the grave (xxi.), or we hear him murmuring of the happy past (xxii.-xxv.), and now and then he glances sadly at love's future (xxvi.). The first Christmas comes, bringing not joy, but renewed sorrow:

"With trembling fingers did we weave The holly round the Christmas hearth,"

Both love and grief have sacred times and seasons—halting-places where the pilgrim finds in memory new food for joy or suffering. So is it in "In Memoriam": Christmas, the New Year, the springtide, his friend's birthday, the anniversary of his death—all these are held solemn to the past (cv.), and they mark the stages by which the poet passes from despair to a nobler grief, which is really love that looks onward, from a sorrow for one lost friend to a joy which reveals not that friend only, but all humanity, living, for ever, in love, with God.

But we must return to that part of "In Memoriam" where the poet is still the sport of moods that are changeful, and mostly despondent. Tremblingly he seeks for "answer, or redress" in nature, in science, in the philosophies (xlix.), but they can neither solve for him the mystery of pain nor show him the passage from death unto life. "Behold, we know not anything"—such is the sad burden of their reply.

Finally, with an exceeding bitter cry, he calls to his spirit friend to help him in his despair:

<sup>1</sup> See also pp. 192 and 193.

"O life as futile, then, as frail!
O for thy voice to soothe and bless!
What hope of answer, or redress?"

And there seems to come an answer of blended resignation and hope,

"Behind the veil, behind the veil." (lvi.)

It is possible that "In Memoriam" originally ended

The next poem opens with the word "Peace," and though the victory is still far off, the poet now does sturdy battle with despair, so that when we again meet with the word "peace" (lxxxvi.), it is no longer a cry for strength and courage in the fight; it is rather the thankful outbreathing of a warrior who pauses for a moment in a conflict nearly won.

And through the poems that follow, loving despair is altogether changed to loving hope; naturally, therefore, we find in the latter portion of "In Memoriam," the brightest, most beautiful, and most spiritual poetry. To treat of this at all adequately is impossible in this brief review, especially as space must be reserved for an expianation of the very important introductory stanzas. We may only point to the many striking and effective contrasts produced by later poems when placed by the side of earlier poems dealing with the same subject. Of these one of the most beautiful is that presented by the second picture of the "Deserted House" (cxix.). Or take the descriptions of Spring time. In poem xxxviii. spring was forlorn as any winter:

"No joy the blowing season gives, The herald melodies of spring."

In lxxxiii. it is invoked with eager but tremulous love:

"Dip down upon the northern shore, O sweet new year delaying long."

But in cxv. spring and love and hope are blended in a music that can be likened only to the rapturous melodies of the lark it sings of, and with the last long streak of snow fades also the last remembrance of long and dreary loss. Regret now blossoms as a springtide flower of love.

In the same way we should contrast and compare the three Christmas poems, or sets of poems (xxviii.-xxx.; lxxviii; civ., cv.); the eternal gloom of the yew-tree in ii. with the doubtful gleam of solace that lives in the yewtree of xxxix.; and there are many others, in most of which the natural world is laid under contribution to heighten the contrast. One such example is the anniversary of Hallam's death (lxxii.); there the poet turns to the disastrous day as to something that had done him and his one friend bitter wrong. How different is the calm control of xcix., in which individual sorrow is purer, truer, lovelier, because it does not forget the sorrows of our common humanity: and how exactly in each case is nature made to reflect the poet's mood. But the triumph of love over both despair and time, and the expansion of that love till it embraces all mankind, is best proclaimed by the clash of the bells as they ring in the New Year (cvi.);

"Ring out the grief that saps the mind . . . Ring in redress to all mankind."

From these poems of place and time which conduct us almost to the end of "In Memoriam," we learn how the poet gradually turned the discipline of sorrow to best and fullest account:

"Tis held that sorrow makes us wise." (cviii. and cxiii.)

Sorrow made Tennyson a true poet; it may help us to live true lives. Sorrow purifies us, even as silver is tried in the fire. We have seen how it widens our sym-

<sup>1</sup> Poets, says Shelley, are

&quot;Cradled into poetry by wrong
They learn in suffering what they teach in song," pathies; so also does it enlarge our range of vision; and even as the dead we love (lvi.):

"Watch, like God, the rolling hours With larger, other eyes than ours, To make allowance for us all,"

so the living poet whose affliction had wrought for him a larger hope, and with hope an ampler love, could at last add to these precious fruits of sorrow a faith half lost in sight:

"Far off thou art, but ever nigh;
I have thee still, and I rejoice;
I prosper, circled with thy voice;
I shall not lose thee tho I die."

Surely it is not a little that we, a world of mourners, should be taught how to grieve; that a great and noble man should have laid bare to us his spiritual life through years of much tribulation; should have allowed us to watch the conflict waged within his soul between the powers of doubt and darkness and weakness and selfishness on the one side, and on the other, faith, light, strength, and love; that he should have gained the victory—our victory no less than his; for who can read "In Memoriam" without being wiser, and happier, and better?

This, surely, is not a little. But what should be our gratitude to the great poet who has set all this before our eyes in a form of surpassing beauty, which stands more over as the monument of a love so perfect that as long as that monument remains with us—and it will remain with us always-love itself can never die.

A few words concerning the Epilogue, the first of the 131 poems, and their Prologue, will close this section of the Chapter.

THE EPILOGUE was suggested by, and describes, the marriage of Tennyson's younger sister, Cecilia, will Edmund Law Lushington in the year 1842. This may be the date of the verses themselves; but they speak of the "In Memoriam" as "echoes out of weaker times"—"idle brawling rhymes" made long before—a statement which need not be accepted literally.

In Shelley's lament for Keats occur these words of deepest pathos:

"Alas, that all we loved of him should be, But for our grief, as if it had not been, And grief itself be mortal!"

In "In Memoriam" (Ixxviii.) we catch their echo-

"O last regret, regret can die!"

but Tennyson adds these two other lines,

" No, mixt with all this mystic frame Her deep relations are the same;"

and in the Epilogue he writes,

"Regret is dead, but love is more"- so much more that it can now admit and satisfy with undisturbed serenity the claims of personal love, love of the family, love of mankind, and love of God.

POEM I reads like a short preface anticipating criticism. Some men might censure "In Memoriam" as being merely "Private sorrow's barren song "(xxi.), if the poet did not remind them how near akin are love and grief, and that if a man could not grieve, neither could be love.

THE PROLOGUE, dated 1849, is in some respects the most important of Tennyson's writings. From one point of view it is an Apologua pro vita sna; but while essentially self-revealing, it is also a sublime poem. Again, it is another preface, and like the former one, apologetic; but deep devotion, confession of Faith, profound thought on the mystery of Being, prophetic and stern warning, prayerful self-surrender, and a most solemn music of utterance, place it on the highest level of imaginative literature

It is addressed to "immortal Love," and may therefore 1 Stanza 4. 2 Stanzas 32-36.

be further regarded as preface and dedication in one. Although like an overture it suggests the subject matter of the whole work, yet its leading thought is the need of reverence in an age that prides itself far too much upon

"The petty cobwebs we have spun" (cxxiv.);

it asks forgiveness for that erring age, for its poet, for his grief, for his "In Memoriam"; and the wisest man in all the world concludes his great work with a supplication of touching humility,

"In thy wisdom make me wise."

V.—The following commentary tendeavours to indicate more clearly the course of thought that runs through the eleven introductory stanzas.

As already suggested, they are a general Preface, which includes Invocation, Apology, Confession of Faith, Prayer, and also, to some extent, Dedication—a Preface, written, as we may suppose, some twelve years after the poem itself was completed. And just as Poem I.2 is an apology to the general public for a seeming indulgence in this long poetical expression of grief, so these stanzas contain a reverent apology to the God who, if He found it good to take away, had first found it good to give. Somewhat similar is the thought contained in this other beautiful stanza by Tennyson:

"God gives us love; something to love He lends us; but when love is grown To ripeness, that on which it throve Falls off, and love is left alone."

It is, then, as an Apology, that these stanzas have most interest for us, and they are addressed to that Immortal Love, to whom, by his search after a lost mortal love, the poet was gradually led. With Faith as his guide during this long journey, he passed safely by pitfalls of reason, and stumbling-blocks of seeming facts, till he reached the inmost regions of the spiritual life, held communion with his spirit friend (Poem xcv.), and with him bowed before the throne of Divine Love, "the Lord and King" (Poem cxxvi.).

<sup>1</sup> From "New Studies in Tranyson."

<sup>2</sup> See former page.

We will now comment on the text in detail.

STRONG:—As opposed to our weakness, discovered by the poet's investigations; and strong because the same investigations convinced the poet that love, the highest human aspiration, emotion, and virtue; love begotten of God and incarnate in Christ, and thus linking the human with the divine; and love, the essence of the Deity, was the one thing powerful in life, powerful over death, powerful for eternity.

SON OF GOD, IMMORTAL:—These epithets were anticipated in the former note; the poem began with an individual love, and with death, and rose to the height of the great Universal Love and Immortality; and that universal love which the poet reached through the personal could only thus be comprehended by his human mind—as begotten of the Author of all (whose most precious attribute is love), and as made divine-human in the Son; destined again in any of its threefold characters to last for ever.

But, "Il doit moins se prouver qu'il ne doit se sentir," or, in Latin, "Crede ut intelligas" (Poem cxxiv.), that is, "We feel God; do not find him out" (by any human methods). It was not subtle analysis, but promptings of "the likest God within the soul," that revealed God to the searcher. This—and it occurs in the very first stanza—is the main argument of the poem, that belief in foundation truths rests not upon reason nor philosophy, nay, nor on the creeds themselves; but upon convictions, high emotions, Divine instincts. Once more, the "broken light" of a human love guided the poet to that love which is the light and the life of the universe.

<sup>1</sup> Especially the first and second; see also former note, and Poem xlvii.

"The divinity that stirs within us." (Cp. Poem lv. x.)

STANZA II.—Love, then, or the God who is Love, is the Author of all things. Stupendous and blessed thought! Ah, but then that same Being must be the Author of Death, and He seems almost to scorn us dead.

STANZA III. -But is there nothing beyond death?

There must be, for the Maker is Love.

STANZA IV.—Ah, yet again; for the love of the Godhead is too high for us! But has it not been written, "Through Him, therefore, we have access unto the Father"? In such mysterious wise, then, the Divine love may reach our humanity and the individual man. Another mystery, "the abysmal deeps of personality" (Cp. Poem xlv.), the marvel of free will, of the responsible "Ego." No marvel; a "broken light" again; this scheme of individuals in a vast universe, and in the presence of its vaster Maker is both grand and simple; we are created by being allowed to create ourselves. This is the law within the law. ("The Two Voices.")

STANZA V.—Can a part contain the whole? Who, then, may hope to "read the riddle of the painful earth," or pluck out the heart of the mystery of his single being? Systems of thought and systems of religion, useful enough in their time and place, can never fully reveal or explain the Author of all, although through these sometimes may shine upon us uncertain rays of the one great Light for which all thirst.3

STANZA VI.—Therefore, yet once again, and even in this nineteenth century, we have nothing to rest on but Faith; for what we call knowledge is derived entirely

1 See especially "The Higher Pantheism." The figure, not unknown in other poets, occurs repeatedly in Tennyson.

&quot;To work out our own salvation with fear and trembling."

English Liturgy.

&quot;Which thro' the web of being blindly wove, Burns bright or dim, as each are mirrors of The light for which all thirst." Shelley, "Adonais," from the material world, by the operation of the intellect. It could never explain the unknown. Science, no doubt, has its uses; it may give us wider views of the material universe, and so help us, if we learn aright, to "look through nature up to nature's God"; even this instrument Knowledge is one of His gifts who giveth all.

STANZA VII.—But what of the abuses of Science, especially if we may judge from the spirit of the times?¹ I wish it all prosperity, but I trust it may still be tempered with reverence; and may we never lose sight of the time when childlike ignorance gave us childlike faith; and may the moral, the emotional, and the intellectual faculties still in the same well-balanced mind make unto earth and heaven "one grand sweet song"—nay, grander, as the new and gifted ages lend each their strong new harmonies.

STANZA VIII.—But alas! in this nineteenth century are we not irreverent and foolish, and made yet more foolish and irreverent by the arrogant knowledge we vainly deem wisdom?

STANZA IX.—And am not I of all men most foolish? (See paraphrase.) $^2$

STANZA X.—And my grief—alas, that too was folly.

1 "What is she, cut from love and faith," etc. (Poem exiv.). One of the most important of the lessons taught by this great teacher. It is the one that occurs most frequently, and is insisted upon most sterally. To our thinking the warning, the faith, the hope of Poem exx. is of more vital interest to the world than all the achievements of modern science. Too often "Science is like the sun, which reveals the face of earth, but seals and shuts up the face of Heaven;" and if through Science human beings are to revert to greater apes, "what matters science unto men?" (Poem exx. Seep. 27.)

2" Forgive all the so called sinful actions; forgive all the so-called meritorious actions of my past life. Sinful and meritorious are terms that have no meaning except for the imperfect being that employs them—man. Therefore I asked thee to forgive my merit as well.* Man is worthy or unworthy only in respect to his relations with man; though he should do all for Thee, yet wouldst Thou account him an unprofitable servant."

&quot;The best of what we do and are,

Just God, forgive!"

WORDSWORTH.

STANZA XI.-And to pour forth that rebellious grief in this long faultful poem was folly most of all.

VI. ANALYSIS OF THE POEM. Many attempts have been made to follow the course of the poet's thought from the beginning to the end of "In Memoriam"; also to discover some natural divisions in the poem; but none of these attempts is at all trustworthy. We cannot do better than accept the poet's own indication of parts into which the poem may be divided; but the borders of these will not always be clearly defined. The following is the grouping supplied by the poet to Mr. Knowles, who has given it publication in "The Nineteenth Century"; and we venture to add suggestions respecting the subject of each group.

Group. I. II. III. IV.	Poems. 1-8 9-20 (19?) 20-27 28-49	Subject. Regrets before burial. Interval, and burial. Regrets after burial. Christmas. and deep musings to follow.
V. VI. VII. VIII.	50-58 59-71 72-98 99-103	In the depths. A new resolve; happier recollections. A year from birthday to birthday. The second birthday. Leaving Lincolnshire.
IX.	104-131	Another Christmas. A. H. H. A new year. Another spring. Concluding reflections.

2423

CHAPTER X.

"MAUD," 1855.

I. SUBJECT OF THE POEM. The explanatory title, "A Monodrama" added in later editions, is foreshadowed in the following extract from a letter of Tennyson to Dr. Mann: "No one with this essay before him can in future pretend to misunderstand my dramatic poem, 'Maud'; your commentary is as true as it is full." In this letter, and by the subsequent addition "A Monodrama," Tennyson means to tell us that his method was strictly dramatic

"By making speak, myself kept out of view, The very man."

Browning, Sordello.

In 1856, the year following the appearance of "Maud," Dr. R. J. Mann had published a pamphlet entitled "Maud Vindicated," in which with vigour and with insight he sought to show that "Maud" was purely objective.

The relation that should exist between the main artistic or objective purpose or element of a work of art, and the other, the usually subordinate yet sometimes eventually supreme subjective element or purpose, has been fully considered in Chapter V. It was there pointed out that this subjective, or moral, or didactic element appeared to be in excess in the two "Locksley Halls," and in some of the longer poems near to them in date; the slightly disfigured the characters exhibited, and gethem a tendency to caricature. At the same time found an obvious reason, if not a necessity for that excin contemporary events, in the appearance of the stellments in many of the minor contemporary poems the poet's idiosyncrasies, and in his mode of expression himself.

Among the poems surrounding the first "Lock Hall," "Maud" was specially mentioned as being man by a deliberate intrusion of personal and contempor material. We seemed to hear the angry prophet or noisy patriot far too much, and the sweet singer too li

Certainly the four times repeated "curse" of "Locks Hall," when we meet with it twice invoked in "Mai is put into the mouth of a madman; but when the h is sane he uses language almost as violent, as in indignant assertion "We have made them a curse or where he cynically exclaims "I will bury myself myself, and the Devil may pipe to his own."

Such characters as those of the two "Locksley Hal and "Maud" (other poems might be included) all se as a persona, a convenient mask, by means of which poet may disguise himself while he "foams and speriddles"; characters so uproariously reprehensible twhen they have interlarded the poet's soberer speech witheir own insobriety he may bully them for it at his vand shield himself from all blame. How much the bethen, for him, if they show symptoms of madness; the ravings will effectually drown his loudest vituperations

Therefore in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," querulous leading personage is careful to call himse dreamer and a dotard: "Am I mad?" asks the love: "Locksley Hall," though casually; but he adds, "I ki my words are wild." "What; am I raging?" cries the other lover in "Maud;" "No matter if I go mad"; and he goes mad soon after.

Maud. 30

"It should be called 'Maud, or the Madness.' It is slightly akin to 'Hamlet.'" This remark of Tennyson to Mr. Knowles will be of much service to us in our endeavour to ascertain whether Dr. R. J. Mann discovered the whole truth about "Maud."

It has already been mentioned incidentally that Hamlet is not a consistent character. To begin with, he is more thoughtful and less obviously mad in the later play; and in this, as the drama proceeds, he grows in years, in disposition, in doubtfulness between sanity and insanity; "I know my words are wild," so he, too, might say; for with words he "unpacks his heart"; his words, and not his actions, are governed most by Shakespeare's soul. How long and how numerous are his soliloquies; what a personal interest he takes in the stage; what faith he has lost in woman; how he ponders over the problems of evil and good, of life and death. How sad he is, and with what mysterious sadness-" Thou would'st not think how ill all's here about my heart." As Shakespeare worked at his character, he drew nearer to him and nearer, gave him more of his own eight-and-thirty years, a maturer mind, a deeper reflectiveness; he is sad most of all with Shakespeare's sadness; and, lest he should reflect the artist too closely, Shakespeare drives him to and fro on the verge of madness.

It is in this sense, as we venture to think, that "' Maud' is slightly akin to 'Hamlet.'"

It may also be noticed that Ophelia, in contrast to Hamlet, goes mad in the ordinary way; she has played her part by mainly contributing to the catastrophe; Shakespeare has no further thought for her; and she leaves the stage singing a requiem for the father whom her lover has slain. Maud, too, is unheroic enough to make good tragedy possible; and she vanishes from the scene with "a cry for a brother's blood" shed by her lover. But Tennyson's Hamlet was to die only the temporary death of raving madness; therefore Maud must come on the stage once more, and direct the final issues; but how feebly! She is dwarfed, even to insignificance, by the personage of War. Shakespeare might have done something like this when he was writing "King John"; but he never would have made his "Maud" such a traitor to its title.

This brings us back to Dr. Mann's argument, which seems to admit of ready refutation. "Not a murmur," he tells us, "leaves the lips of the poet. These loud outcries for war fitly proceed from a character sensitive, morbid, hysterical, mad." The outcries therefore will cease when the character has become cured of its many diseases. Is it so? On the contrary, in Part III., which presents the hero redeemed and sane, denunciation of peace and clamour for war is as loud and as unreasonable as ever.\(^1\)

Next, as was shown in Chapter V., the lover in "Maud" is not the only character in Tennyson's poems of the same period who "rails at the ill:" and when we find that the same angry protests against the time's abuse are made not only by several fictitious characters, but also by the poet when he speaks unequivocally for himself we cannot escape the conclusion that the character was made to suit the occasion at least as much as the occasion happened to suit the character. In the same chapter "marriage-

I Even in the "conscience-clause" at the end (last six lines of the poem,) there is no thought of her who made his life "a perfumed altar-thame;" her for whom he "would die." He is satisfied merely because he has "awaked" to the fight to enthusiasm for his native land, to a liking for his fell wemen that was form on the neal f listtle. For these he will live his life and die his death.

2 See next page.

edering mammon was mentioned as the strial entring persistently attacked by Tennyson spherry at this new and the appropriate passage in "Mand was givened in Part I. N. o. "Bought? what is the cannot buy? which we are now tompted to add "("finitese, the cawen-faced mullionare intended in parthase Mand: d'Burile sould her hittiers appearance be. Bur vision you the same section with the applicable to you the timuson of motomorphism material. The estimation personal in printing the source.

Whose ear is cramm'd with his cotton. . . .

d in the mad scene the Quaker is again censured for a love of peace. If we have turn to "The Third of sbruary, 1952, we hear Tennyson speaking absolutely r himself—

> "Tho' niggard throats of Manchester may hawl— We are not cotton-spinners all."

Surely an opinion publicly announced in one poem as Tennyson himself, is no less his own for being two cluded in almost the same words, though "monotomatically," in another poem of almost the same date. It has either such example this section of conclude, "Maud," Fam I, in 1, the monotraments character made to exclaim

"For nature is one with rapine, a harm no presenter tan lead;
The Mayfly is torm by the swallow, ..."

his is almost word for word with Tennyson's avowed terance, as of conviction, in "In Memoriam," Ivi. 4, the ste being probably only a short time earlier:

ight to a correspondent, Feb. 13th, 1888.

"Tho' Nature, red in tooth and claw With ravine, shriek'd against his creed."

II. THE STANZAS IN "THE TRIBUTE." The nameless stanzas contributed by Tennyson to "The Tribute" of 1837, form the very slight foundation on which "Maud' was eventually built up. This upbuilding of "Maud' came about at the suggestion of Sir John Simeon, who remarked of the poem in "The Tribute" that it seemed as if something were wanting to explain the story. But an attempt will be made in this section to show that the earlier verses were spoilt in the process of new building that in "Maud" they have lost their interest and become a little confusing.

The stanzas as they originally appeared formed a poem of strange and pathetic beauty. A portion of them, with certain alterations, now constitute the fourth section of the second part of "Maud"; and nothing perhaps wil show more clearly the cross purposes and crooked qualities of some parts of the longer poem than a comparison of the stanzas in "The Tribute" with those of

Part II., section iv. in "Maud."

We will take the stanzas of "The Tribute" first. Here a lover has lost her whom he loved, and by whom he was beloved; she was his "bride to be;" he had "woo'd her for his wife;" and suddenly death removed her from his side. The poem opens as in "Maud," Part II., section iv. the first few stanzas are almost the same in both. Apparently the lover in "The Tribute" is a wanderer in a foreign country, for the third line of stanza 2 reads:

"Of the land that gave me birth."

After the fifth stanza the two poems often differ; the references to the duel scene are absent from "The Tribute." There the story in detail is as follows: -(1-2 The lover desires that the dead should still be near him at his side; (3) but instead of the dead love as he knev ter, or as he believes her to be in "the regions of her est," he is haunted by the vulgar ghost, her earthly hadow, "not thou, but like to thee." And on that account he more he yearns for the visitation of her real presence; tearns to know the nature of her being, and its home.

But the earthly shadow, the mere mechanic apparition, lone is present to him:—(4) "It leads me forth at vening . . . . in a cold white robe." (5-6) His dreamings n thenight-time die away in terror when it comes "without nowledge, without pity" to stand persistent by his bed. 8) The dreary morning dawns only to be made yet more lreary by the "dreary phantom." (9) It pursues him as ay advances even through "the hubbub of the market." 10) Then more than ever, amid the throng of men, he eeks for solace in the happy past; (11) and when dayight is at its broadest, and the din of life is loudest, and he shadow flits nearest about him, he would fain creep nto some dark cavern and weep out his soul to his love. Thus, as in the two "Marianas" and other poems, decription has followed the daily round of sadness. (12) Then he angrily adjures the Shadow to be gone; "Get hee hence, nor come again;" and sets about explaining he weird apparition in terms of science:

> "'Tis the blot upon the brain That will show itself without."

At this point we must bring in two passages from "In Memoriam" that explain what precedes, and illustrate ennyson's theory of the dead who die not:

"If any vision should reveal
Thy likeness, I might count it vain
As but the canker of the brain. . . ." (xcii.)

"No visual shade of some one lost,
But he, the Spirit himself, may come
Where all the nerve of sense is numb Spirit to Spirit, Ghost to Ghost." (xciii.)

The remaining six stanzas of the poem in "The Tribute" are merely an application of the doctrine involved in the above quotations to a particular experience.

Stanza (13) is as printed in "Maud" (12), of course omitting the line, "Or to say 'Forgive the wrong."

(Stanza 14) "But she tarries in her place,
And I paint the beauteous face
Of the maiden that I lost,
In my inner eyes again,
Lest my heart be overborne
By the thing I hold in scorn,
By a dull mechanic ghost
And a juggle of the brain."

Some of the words in italics are repeated in "Maud;" the "blot upon the brain" of these two poems is the "canker of the brain" quoted above from "In Memoriam." The "inner eyes" are explained in stanzas 15 and 16:

(15) "I can shadow forth my bride As I knew her, fair and kind, As I woo'd her for my wife; She is lovely by my side In the silence of my life— 'Tis a phantom of the mind," which phantom we are told in (16) is fair and good, and guards his life from ill,

"Tho' its ghastly sister glide
And be moved around me still
With the moving of the blood
That is moved not of the will."

The last two lines convey a further explanation of stanz 8 in the "Maud" version, "the blot upon the brain Tha will (sic) show itself without."

That the "drearier phantom" is a product of physics derangement as opposed to the spiritual presence within his spirit, is set forth in the next stanza (17):

"Let it pass, the dreary brow, Let the dismal face go by. Will it lead me to the grave? Then I lose it: it will fly: Can it overlast the nerves Can it overlive the eye?" This is the ghostly disease of "Maud," Part II., section i. 5. In Part III. vi. 1, Maud "seem'd to divide in a dream from a band of the blest," saying, "I tarry for thee." Of this we have the germ in the last stanza (18) of of the poem in "The Tribute":

"But the other, like a star,
Thro' the channel windeth far
Till it fade and fail and die,
To its Archetype that waits
Clad in light by golden gates—
Clad in light the spirit waits
To embrace me in the sky."

And now we understand what otherwise is scarcely incelligible, the third division of Part III. vi. in "Maud." The "morbid eye" finds a meaning in the line, "Can it overlive the eye?" and one symptom of the "old hysterical nock-disease" is the "disease" of II. ii. 5; and the 'dreary phantom" is the "hard mechanic ghost" of that passage, and the "shadow" of II. iv. 3.

Of the poem in "The Tribute" it is hard to speak temperately; the plaintive strange sweet music that it murnurs to itself murmurs ever in the ears of him who has once neard it. But the stanzas in "Maud" are very different; the shadow, the mechanic ghost, appears before Maud is dead, II. i. 2, II. ii. 5; and is explained as a "juggle born of the orain:" when she has died, the same shadow, as it seems, 'the blot upon the brain" appears again, stripped of half ts ghostly mystery. Maud comes from "a stiller world of he dead" (Cymbeline) and stands by the madman in his nadness; she comes again-it was but a dream (III. vi. 2); and ultimately the "dreary phantom" flies to the scene of war-leaves him at peace because he is going to war These various appearances are a little confusing. The subject cannot be fully dealt with in this chapter; but a careful examination of the stanzas of II. iv. will show urther that they do not form a consistent poem when regarded by themselves, and much less when taken in their connection with the rest of the Monodrama; at several points they fail to be in keeping with the former drift of the story. It will also appear that this inconsistency is due partly to the war motive forced into the poem, and partly to the eccentricities of the leading character. When we think of the other lover in "The Tribute," we may be inclined to marvel that Maud could ever have loved the madman of the longer poem.

III. THE MADNESS. (1) In the plot of "Maud" lurk several improbabilities—incidents of doubtful dramatic propriety. From these we will single out for brief examination the celebrated mad scene (Part II. v.)

"The Princess," like "Maud," is, properly speaking, a monologue; and when in Canto VI. of "The Princess" the next character begins his long soliloquy, he is somewhat puzzled how to relate events he has not seen; incidents that occurred while he was unconscious, or his ravings while he was delirious in fever. He attempts to overcome the difficulty, as will be understood from the following doubtful lines:

"Seeing, I saw not, hearing not, I heard: Tho' if I saw not, yet they told me all So often that I speak as having seen."

We might grant this possible in the case of a prince, even to the extent of recording the mutterings of a mind wandering in disease. But Maud's lover is a friendless man, a fugitive among men; he has been the inmate of a madhouse "so long" (Part III. i.), it may be years. No one would be likely to tell him what he said during that time. Ophelia either speaks her madness to the audience, or some other character repeats what he has heard her say. This holds good of all other examples of insanity in literature that we can remember.

(2) In "The Two Voices" there is an allusion to madness which seems at variance with Tennyson's treatment of the subject in this section:

"And men, whose reason long was blind, From cells of madness unconfined Oft lose whole years of darker mind."

In the same poem we are told that men who have recovered from a trance often forget what then passed through their minds until they fall into a trance again. And in "In Memoriam," lxxi., trance and madness are said to be akin. It is not usual, we believe, for men who have been mad to recall the ravings of their insanity. It would, therefore, seem improbable that this insane person should remember what occurred during his period of confinement in Bedlam.

- (3) Doubtless there are various forms of madness, most of which include unconscious cerebration and wild speech. But this mad scene is surely too rational, too consecutive to represent the incoherent ravings of a friendless lunatic long confined in a mad cell. There is too much method in his madness, whether as regards the matter or its arrangement. This any reader of the poem will be able to discover. The maniac recalls the past in an exact sequence of events and censorious reflections, varied only by a curious new topic—the "churchmen" who "fain would kill their church."
- (4) When brought to bear on the mental aberration and jangled utterance of madness, criticism is reduced to conjecture. The lover in this section fancies, madman-like, (1) that he is dead, (2) that he is not mad; he has also a confused recollection of the past. This, according to Tennyson, in "In Memoriam," lxxi. and iv., is sometimes the peculiarity of dreams; but, as we may judge from this stanza and the references to "The Two Voices," it is an exceptional occurrence. Further, the madman fancies he has been thrust into a "shallow grave," "only a yard beneath the street." There is no end to the dinabove him: yet he can hear the dead men chatter; he is ma "world" of the dead; the dead go ever around him; Maud, who has come from another stiller world, stands by him silent; then he returns to the yard-deep grave that he seems to have converted into a "world." All this, however, is conjecture.

LIBRARY ST. MARY'S COLLEGE

(5) But the conjecture may be admitted to have some purpose in it; because "The whole of the stanzas where he is mad in Bedlam, from Dead, long dead, to Deeper, ever so little deeper, were written in twenty minutes, and some mad doctor wrote to me that nothing since Shakespeare has been so good for madness as this." This remark made by Tennyson when reading his "Maud" to some friends, should be received, we think, with reverential regret.

(6) With this regret in our minds, we now glance at the form of the section. It is more irregular than usual. The subject of excess in irregularity has been noticed in Chapter III. p. 75. A few words may be added here.

This series of lyrical structures in "Maud" may be compared to a succession of emotional waves breaking on a beach that gives them utterance and uncertain rest. From this point of view they are admirably adapted to an impulsive character who reveals his history by a series of moody outbursts. But, after all, waves are more or less regular and similar, and the sometimes symmetrical, sometimes formless lyrics of "Maud" do not as a whole produce quite the unity of impression left on the mind by the unsymmetrical symmetry of such an architectural experiment as the interior of Roslin Chapel. We can understand that they "take the shape" each of some new emotional phase; but until emotional phases are capable of rigid classification, they may not become substitutes for the definite structural units of poetry. It is delightful to hear the lines of Shakespeare as they pass from rhythmless metre to metrical rhythm (pp. 104-5); but the next stage is disintegration. We may be amused to see the "Parts of Speech" melt down in the crucible of philology; we hould not be amused to see English blank verse the inest art form ever moulded by man—reduced to the imorphous pulp of Macpherson's "Fingal." And this is rue of the larger structural units and structures of verse; he time has not yet come when emotional form may be transfigured into formless emotion; we cannot watch the operation of the law that governs such a change as that, for it is not visible to mortal eye; absolute beauty must dwell a little longer in the heavens. And now, returning to our subject, the first two lines of this fifth lyric of Part II. in "Maud" may be said to suggest the fitful utterance of a maniac; but they are not poetry. Neither are they prose; for they rhyme with a line in the context. The last division again (11) is neither verse nor prose.

Ophelia turns her passion to prettiness sometimes in prose, sometimes in verse; but there is no halting between the two.

IV. THE MUSIC OF MAUD. The present writer once read a French version of "Maud." It yielded him many a merry laugh, but, with that, much concern for the unhappy translator. Translate "Maud" into French! you might as well try to send a nightingale's song to France in a bottle securely corked. (Alas, we are near doing that now.) Some poetry, Byron's for example, can be reproduced just a little in another language:

"You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, But the scent of the roses will cling round it still."

But those parts of "Maud" whose word-music of emotion thrills you till the dull touch of intellect is felt no longer attempt to translate these—

"You seize the flower-the bloom is shed!"

Of this fine intangible poetry, which is so abundant in "Maud," some account has been given on p. 78; and it will be referred to again in the commentary appended below.

It has been said that Tennyson could not bear to hear his songs sung; that is excellent. Some of us will never forget hearing Sims Reeves sing "Come into the garden, Maud." We admired Sims Reeves immensely, but we hoped never to hear him sing that song again. It may be recited till one's breath is caught away; but it ought not to be sung. These remarks apply also to such pieces as "Sweet and low," "Ask me no more," "Tears, idle tears." Poetry does sometimes transcend music; and then music must keep away from it. Though slightly irregular in form, yet in regard to their number and the delicate intellectual accompaniment of their melody, the stanzas "Come into the garden, Maud," are the most perfect specimens of their kind. But they have no kind; and if music spoils them, what shall talking do?

This leads us to a final criticism on "Maud;" it can hardly be fairer than the one inscribed in his volume of "Maud" by the writer of these comments many years ago:

"Tennyson's worst poem but finest poetry."

V. A COMMENTARY ON "MAUD," 2

PART I.

SECTION I.—The hero tells his tale of death and villainy; "and are we not all villains? And no wonder; 'For the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that Honour feels.' Better war, loud war, if in peace we murder each ¹ Poetry in which faultless form is vitalized by faultless spirit; so vitalized, indeed, that form and spirit "touch and mingle, are transfigured," as far as may be in poetic art. Such poetry has a charm not inferior to the charm of music, in which the transfiguration is complete; nay, rather, superior, because expressed in that word-symbolism by whose aid the sound-symbolism of music was developed, and to which, consciously or unconsciously, the eloquence of music must for many generations longer be related.

? From "New Studies in Tennyson."

her for gold. In such a sordid age I may well be isanthropos, and hate mankind. I am ready to hate aud."

SECTION II .- Maud comes on the scene, and her insence begins to operate at once, for he falls to criticising

SECTION III.—The new influence in Sleep (as in the In Memoriam "). With one touch of sadness in her auty she rebukes him for hostile and prejudiced criti-

SECTION IV .- Her influence falters for awhile. Springne and Maud are powerless as yet to redeem such an e, though both flash like a light on his darkness. Moreer, a slight misunderstanding (stanza 3), while it ightens dramatic effect, makes the misanthrope a cynic so; and in such a mood he will almost mock at his liverer (stanza 10).

im.

SECTION V .- Her Voice. With wonderful felicity the et presents her SINGING-singing a song that will move en him; a song of the one virtue he recognizes-

Note the fine art whereby the section begins and ends .h "A voice." By that voice-only thus far-he allows r influence; and he fights against her influence still.

SECTION VI.-Her Smile. By way of contrast, nature wns after a night brightened by her recollected smile. r he still plays with his doubts; and these give him an casion (8) to introduce autobiographical grounds for melancholy. But that smile - he cannot forget it; and just realizes how different his life might be. So this tion begins and ends with a smile. (Note the rise and :line of verse and thought in 3.)

SECTION VII.—The new emotion in his mind calls up incident of the past, which establishes the hero's right make advances. Note the same device in "The ncess,"

SECTION VIII.—The next meeting, which borrows certain charm from surroundings.

SECTION IX.—A new character—the rival wooer. Cortrast metre of this with former section; for it indicates reaction. Notice also the background of nature in ha mony with the foreground of incident.

SECTION X.—Jealousy—indispensable element in story of love—quickens the hero's passion and our intere Once more he turns round on his time to upbraid it. Yhe takes a lesson from Maud (4); begins to change lo of self for love of her: "O for a man, a statesman greenough and good enough for me—for Maud" (5); as again, self-correction (6), otherwise he would have be extravagant.

SECTION XI.-

"A trembling apprehension always waits Our highest joys."

SHIRLEY.

This section hints at an arrangement for the next.

SECTION XII. — The Woodland Meeting. The roc miss Maud, and caw their consternation; the shrille songsters of the wood answer with many a sympathe trill; the rooks again grow hoarsely anxious, for is not young lord-lover waiting at the Hall? But Maud's spar shows his teeth to the rival, who has come a little too le SECTION XIII.—The course of true love never did smooth. A first check -her brother. (The miserly fat shuns the honest light of day.) As to Maud's moth she is a reflection of the mother in "The Princess," of the poet's own mother. A couplet (4) of self-castition, again, as at end of Section X.

SECTION XIV.—He surveys the situation, and preparate for the meeting of XVI. and XVII. (1) Early morr in Maud's garden; (2) her bower. (3) He has not e tendency to analyse emotions; (compare with "In emoriam.") (4) He has looked unconcerned on death therto; but now he shudders at sleep, the mere semance of death;—now, for he thinks much of Maud, and gins to think that no man may even die unto himself.

<sup>1</sup> The low vowel in Mand suggests the note of the rooks; the high v in here, the note of the songsters.

SECTION XV.—If then Maud has become so dear to m, surely he must make himself worthier—if heavenly race permit. Here, at least, is a life-duty. Any man in die for a woman, but few are the men who will live rone. Further, "Love annihilates self, even while exting it, and crowns life in a twofold ecstasy of renunciation and attainment"; or thus:

"He doth not love himself aright Who doth not love another more."

SECTION XVI.—In the absence of the brother they eet—but first, one other doubt; (2) and yet one fear; ) "Let not the sight of her beauty bereave me of the ower to speak my love."

SECTION XVII.—The "IVilt thou?" and "The happy 'es?"—Here in word-music, quivering with expectant upture or tremulous with ecstasy beyond the reach of tought, the poet thrills us into sacred sympathy with the tost exquisite emotion of human life.

SECTION XVIII.—Exquisite word-music again; its eynote is "calming itself." For it tells of tranquil possion of perfect happiness. Contrast rhythm with that former section. XVII. is as a mountain streamlet urrying joyously impatient to reach the valley of its esire; XVIII. as a full-flowing river—"Full to the anks—close on the promised good."

In Division 3 of this section the nameless hero takes in natural world into his confidence, and, like the lover a the "Talking Oak" unburdens his heart to a tree; and in (4) he talks calmly to the stars that govern our conditions with an iron tyranny; "Astronomy and Geology, arrible Muses."—Parnassus. "What is it all but a trouble of ants in the gleam of a million million of suns — Vastness. But this "iron hollow of doubtful heaver can "numb him not or torture not again";

"For love possess'd the atmosphere,
And fill'd the breast with purer breath . . .
(Div. 6.) With farther lookings on."

Miller's Daughter,

And not only Life, but Death also, is transformed I Love; and Nature in the light of love displays new beaut (Division 7.) But fair as may be the everlasting reig of love beyond the grave,

("And if God will
I shall but love thee better after death."
E. B. Browning.)

let true life and its true love come first ("In Memorian Ixxxv.); and in this best way shall the life and love th follows death be truer.\(^1\) Note the emphatic thou of the seventh line; for to the new counsellor, Maud, he loving confides his first doubt.

(Division 8.) "What charm in words, a charm I words could give!" and I must not mar this enchante and enchanting music with more than just one commen we notice at the end of the division that the culmination of ecstasy gives the cue for tragedy to enter.

SECTION XIX.—Two short lines serve to indicate the tragic turning—forecast the catastrophe. Compare the stage direction "Enter a servant," "Julius Cæsan III. i. 121; the effect is much the same in each case. It among a we have another apology for the morbid condition of the hero when he first appeared on the stage; in 4 and newed justification of his relationship to Maud; in 6, a villain of the play; in 7, woman's kinder, perhaps ster, estimate of man; and Maud, the reconciler, relates incident that adds deadly pathos to the duel. ("A cry a brother's blood"; see Part II. i. 1). In 8 and 9 we there is a mental struggle that ends in a kind result of re, and is moreover introductory to 10. The mercurial bods of the lover are nowhere better described than in a latter division.

<sup>1</sup> The meaning of the last two lines in Division 7 is as follows: The silk cord of love is strengthened by the inweaving of Death's daw's strand "strand" is one of the smaller cords—sometimes of a different colour—th when twisted with others form the larger cord). The thought appears to twofold: rst "The approach of death should make us dearer to each other and, "But death is importality, and immortality alone can make love prefect." See "In Memoriam," xxxiv.; and "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After couplet 36,

SECTION XX.—Much as in "In Memoriam," the trouble sometimes transferred. It is Maud's turn to be metaboly; and no wonder (compare with incident in Aylmer's Field"); the brother has been roughly urging the suit of the lord rival. The plainness of her asses! Plain to the rival, of course; but to the lover, effection. She must wear another dress to-morrow, and tertain, with whatever grace, the villain or the fop. It he too shall see his Maud in "gloss of satin and mamer of pearls;" and she will be gracious to him.

SECTION XXI.—How this is to be accomplished.

SECTION XXII.—First compare this matchless lyric the lines in "The Princess," "Now sleeps the crimson cal" (VII. 161). Stanzas I and 2 sketch le lieu de la scène; the night before the dawn to him who waited; 4 and communings with her two flowers; 6 and 7, the bulbul d the rose in Gulistan, and the sensations and recollens that follow; 8, in the other serenade the flowers all ep; here the lilies and roses watch with the watcher; as in "Becket," so here; the lily and the rose are famong flowers, and are fittest emblems of fairest manhood; but Maud is "lily and rose in one." The

&quot;If Rosamund is
The world's rose, as her name imports her, she Was the world's lily."

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;They made her lily and rose in one."

Ancient Sage.

sun is just rising, but to her flowers "Maud" shall be brighter sun. 10, a sunlit dewdrop shaken from the pa sion flower of XIV. (1), tells that she is coming: "In moment we shall meet." After the fitting and prophet climax of 11,2 the curtain falls. It rises again on in which, after the duel, we discover (1) some return the old malady, followed (2) by broodings in exile; (1) tells us that Maud has died of a broken heart; (4), some portion of the beautiful lyric round which by accr tion the whole poem shaped itself; (5), the delirium madness, which has some resemblance to the fever see in "The Princess," Canto VII.

PART II.,

PART III.

"So then to love is good, to lose is good,
If but the loser bow to penance given;
Thou wilt have purged the grossness of my blood,
Thou wilt have taught me look for thee in Heaven."

And now the two main motives, love, and the stronger patriotism, are blended into one redeeming l purpose.

1 Part II, iv. (6).

"Shake hands, my friend, across the brink Of that deep grave to which I go. . . . . I cannot sink So far, far down, but I shall know Thy voice, and hearken from below."

From "My life is full of weary days." Also Cf. "New Year's Eve:"

"I shall hear you when you pass
With your feet above my head. . . ."

CHAPTER XI.

"IDYLLS OF THE KING."

INTRODUCTORY. It is possible that no reliable estite of this poem can be formed in our day. Most bably the task will be left to some future Addison, and the host of critics who will criticise his criticisms, neration after generation. The question, "What sort poems are the 'Idylls'?" is profoundly interesting, but y far-reaching; indeed, the whole subject is so vast, the best with such extraordinary difficulties, that within the compass of this Handbook suggestions must be ered rather than conclusions.

At first sight nothing can seem easier than to create the nor work of art by the side of the major one—to write, it is, a useful and impressive account whether of the em as a whole, or of the separate Idylls, or of the aracters. But this paper may possibly serve a better rpose if, like the chapter on "The Princess," it seeks her to show with the utmost brevity that any such atment of the subject is liable to be not only imperfect t also misleading.

For example: critics are almost unanimous in regarding miform magnificence of style as the chief merit of Tenson's poem, and the greater number claim also for the ylls an epic unity of design and construction. But in a passage from "New Studies in Tennyson," which appended to this chapter, the present writer has alread attempted to show that in point of style and construction generally the poem is by no means uniform.

Some of the opinions expressed in this Append received remarkable corroboration when Mr. Knowle published his "Aspects of Tennyson (II.)" in the "Nin teenth Century" for January, 1893. For example, th poet is represented as making the following statements "It is necessary to respect the limits. . . . I soon four that if I meant to make any mark at all it must be I shortness, for all the men before me had been so diffus and all the big things had been done. . . . A small vess on fine lines is likely to float further than a great raft." ( the "In Memoriam" he said: "The general way of i being written was so queer that if there were a blank space I would put in a poem." Of "Maud": "It should h called 'Maud; or, the Madness.' It is slightly akin 'Hamlet.'" Also of the "Idylls of the King" he remarked "When I was twenty-four I meant to write a whole grepoem on it, and began to do it in the 'Morte d'Arthui I said I should do it in twenty years, but the Review stopped me."

Without abusing the poet's confidence we may fair repeat that although Tennyson, like Milton at an agalmost as early, determined to write "a whole grepoem," he was nevertheless of the opinion that if I meant to make any mark at all it must be by shortnes and further, that he allowed "the Reviews" to stop hit And this hesitation to attempt a very great work artistic oneness leads us to conjecture that the great works which the poet did attempt might possibly fail some extent in unity of design, unity of composition, ar unity of effect.

As a fact, we have seen something of this in the chapters on "The Princess," "In Memoriam," at Maud." We noticed, for example, that the long period ring which "In Memoriam" was in course of composin exposed the poet to some risk of impairing his unity impression. This risk became much more serious in a writing of a work so difficult and so vast as the dylls"; and, as noticed in the Appendix, other duences tended to interrupt and protract its composing.

II. A CHRONOLOGICAL VIEW OF THE POEM. The ausibility of such a conjecture will appear more plainly we approach our next subject, the history of the comsition of the "Idylls." This history is briefly sumarized in the following chronological table:

33. In this year, as we may say, the poet 2 contemplates writing his "whole great poem." The "Lady of Shalott," in the 1833 volume, is the first fragment of Arthurian romance turned into poetry by Tennyson. The "Palace of Art" in the same volume introduces "That deep-wounded child of Pendragon," and speaks of Alfred as "the flower of Kings." This is the "Flos regum" of Joseph of Exeter, and it is significant that Tennyson at this period gives that well-known title to Alfred.

837. Landor tells us that a MS. poem by Tennyson on the death of Arthur was read to him, and he speaks of the work as being "more Homeric than any poem of our time."

842. The poem Landor has mentioned appears in the volume of 1842, having a Prologue entitled "The <sup>1</sup> It is interesting to note that many a commentator has found "In femoriam" capable of rigid analysis, but that each has analysed it ifferently; and Tennyson himself differently last of all.

<sup>2</sup> Now 24 years of age.

<sup>3</sup> In later editions: " Mythic Uther's deeply-wounded son."

Epic," and followed by an Epilogue without any title. In the Table of Contents "The Epic" and "Morte d'Arthur" appear as independent poems, otherwise we might have regarded the Epilogue as included in "The Epic." The same volume contained the two splendid Arthurian Lyrics, "Sir Galahad" and "Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinevere." This last is styled "A Fragment."

1857. "Enid and Nimuë: The True and the False."

(Privately printed.)<sup>1</sup>

1858. "The Detection of Guinevere and the Last Interview with Arthur" (Clough, "Remains," vol. i., p. 235; or p. 287 in one vol. ed.).

1859. "The True and the False. Four Idylls of the King." Also "Idylls of the King (Enid, Vivien, Elaine, Guinevere)."

Elame, Gumevere).

1862. New Edition of the "Idylls," with dedication to the memory of the Prince Consort.

1869 (dated 1870). The "Holy Grail" volume, containing "The Coming of Arthur," "The Holy Grail," "Pelleas and Ettarre," and "The Passing of Arthur."

1871. "The Last Tournament" (in "The Contemporary Review " for December).

1872. "Gareth and Lynette." Lines "To the Queen" appended to the Idylls. In an edition of this year many passages were added—e.g., lines 9-28 to the "Passing of Arthur," and the marriage song to "The Coming of Arthur."

1874. A new passage of 150 lines introduced into "Merlin and Vivien" (following the fifth line).

1885. "Balin and Balan" in the "Tiresias" volume.

1888. "Geraint and Enid" is divided into "The Marriage of Geraint" and "Geraint and Enid"

<sup>1</sup> The copy in the South Kensington Museum is marked "Revise,"

This table, which might possibly be made yet more omplete, is of the first importance in any attempt to urvey the "Idylls of the King." With its aid we have to discover how the poet wrought at his poem, and that were his own opinions concerning it. It is always well to inquire of the poet first.

Setting aside the lyrics, which have been dealt with lsewhere, we notice that Tennyson begins by turning into blank verse a portion of the twenty-first book of Sir homas Malory's "Le Morte Darthur." Possibly he had written more, but for publication he chooses the most interesting passage in Malory, and the one that gives a ame to the whole volume; and he mostly adopts falory's purely romantic treatment of the subject.

If we now turn to "The Epic," we discover much that interesting and important. It is not advisable to take ne poet literally when he says that the Epic, his "King rthur," consisted of some twelve books, all of which ere burnt except "Morte d'Arthur," which constituted ne eleventh. If we are asked, as sometimes happens, What then would have been the subject of the twelfth ook?" we may answer, "Paradise Regained." The adition "that he shall come again" is common to many eroes of legend and romance.2 Malory's tradition connues, "and he shal wynne the holy crosse." But Malory imself adds, "rather I wyl say here in thys world he hanged his lyf." With the life of Christ before him. ennyson might have chosen the first of these fables; but is doubtful whether the Nineteenth Century would have ade any such twelfth book possible. The mystical number of twelve books, however, have been written, or made, for in 1888 the "Enid" of 1859 was divided into "The Marriage of Geraint" and "Geraint and Enid."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Thou hast said much here of 'Paradise Lost,' but what hast thou to y of Paradise found?" Ellwood to Milton.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Among the many other heroes of history or romance who were to come tain are Charlemagne and Holger Danske, one of his twelve peers; Bartrossa, Roderick, Desmond, Sebastian of Brazil, the Incas of "Westward of", Hiawatha.

At this earlier stage of 1842 the author blames his work for being "Homeric"; "a truth," he thought, would look "freshest in the fashion of the day." He distrusts only the resemblance, not the Homeric qualities, the simplicity, directness, dignity, truth of sentiment, fidelity to legend, delight in the mere story, dramatic description, and so forth; and from the Classics, especially the Greek epics, and such materials as the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer, Malory, "Paradise Lost," and the "Hyperion" of Keats have bequeathed to him he constructs a blank verse that may bear some comparison with the "strong-wing'd music of Homer."

At present, therefore, his doctrine is essentially epical, and of the highest order of epic, although in the epilogue to "Morte d'Arthur" he admits "some modern touches here and there." Also, in a dream, he somewhat significantly sees Arthur "like a modern gentleman Of stateliest port"; and there is the slightest possible suggestion, not as yet of allegory, but merely of a moral purpose, in the lines, "Come again, and thrice as fair. . . . With all good things, and war shall be no more."

We can never be sure how long before the date of its appearance any particular Idyll or part of it was written; but, on the hypothesis that each poem was finished only a short time before publication, we next speak of the volume of 1857. This, however, as mentioned in the Table, was not published. A few copies only were printed for private circulation. The title-page is as follows: "Enid and Nimuë: The True and the False, by Alfred Tennyson, Poet Laureate, London. Moxon: 1857."

This volume contains two of the Idylls, "Enid" and "Vivien," in an earlier form.

In the year 1859 a proof was printed with half-title, The True and the False. Four Idylls of the King;" and, for full title, "The True and the False. Four Idylls of the King, by Alfred Tennyson, P.L., D.C.L. London: Edward Moxon & Co., Dover Street. 1859."

These title-pages are given in full because something useful to our purpose may be learnt from them. In this second volume we find the two former stories, "Enid" and 'Nimuë" (considerably altered), together with two new ones, "Elaine" and "Guinevere." In the table of contents "Nimuë" is cancelled; and "Vivien" is the name already adopted in the body of the book. Both volumes contain corrections of great interest to the student of Tennyson.

To turn now to the title-pages. In the distinction "The True and the False," we have the first reliable indication of moral purpose; but, again, not as yet of any allegorical intention. That some importance may be attached to this title seems clear from the fact that in the 1859 copy it twice takes precedence over "Idylls of the King." Herein we recognize also the principle of antithesis or contrast, the helpful setting off of character against character, most common to beginners in dramatic art. This important element will receive fuller notice below. Further, it appears that the title, "Idylls of the King," was selected not earlier than 1857 nor later than 1859. One would think that the poet, in defiance of the "Reviews" that "stopped him," now cautiously ventured to link these stories to the fortunes of "Flos regum"; and this idyllic treatment of the great epic theme was probably suggested by Theocritus.

But there is another point. Proof copies of the "Enoch Arden" volume of 1864 were styled "Idylls of the Hearth." "Idylls of the King," and "Idylls of the Hearth," are therefore near enough in date to imply that in the former of the two we may discover Tennyson's unwillingness to regard his four pictures of women with their tinge of parable as books of an epic; that he almost preferred t class them with the "Idylls" of the "Enoch Arden volume.

When, later, in 1859, these four stories appeared a "Idylls of the King," they were drawn yet nearer to th central myth by the motto "Flos regum Arthurus."

We now come to the year 1870, in which four mor "Idylls" were published '-" The Coming of Arthur, "The Holy Grail," "Pelleas and Ettarre," and "The Passing of Arthur." In this volume also the poet supplie us with hints respecting his design. Important and sig nificant changes are made in the titles, for "Enid," "Vivien," and "Elaine" become respectively "Gerain and Enid," "Merlin and Vivien," and "Lancelot and Elaine"; and these later titles are less suggestive o studies of women, and more clearly connected with the Arthurian legends. The "Idylls" are now spoken of as "the whole series"; there is the "Round Table" of six idylls, or poems (both these terms are used, but not a present the term books), and it is preceded by "The Coming of Arthur," and followed by "The Passing of Arthur." Concerning the latter poem we are informed in a note: "This last, the earliest written of the poems, is here connected with the rest in accordance with an early project of the author's."

Does this include the whole of "The Passing of 1 "The Holy Grail and other Poems." Flos Regum Arthurus is retained on the title-page.

2 A curious title, and probably an afterthought. According to the poet as quoted below, King Arthur means the soul, and the Round Table the passions and capacities of a man. If so, this is no longer the Round Table (printed in small capitals in early editions) of "Morte d'Arthur," which was "an image of the mighty world"; it is rather the Round Table of "Balin and Balan":

> "This old sun-worship, boy, will rise again, And beat the cross to earth, and break the King And all his table."

This subject is referred to again in Section V.

Arthur"? probably not. And here we may notice some subsequent additions to this idyll; such are the "weird rhyme," "From the great deep to the great deep he goes," which is repeated from "The Coming of Arthur"; also lines 9 to 28, which appear to be suggested by "The Last Tournament." Already therefore we may venture to regard "The Last Tournament" (1871) as an afterthought, arising probably out of the passage in "Guinevere;" "Then came the sin of Tristram and Isolt;" but also thrust into the story in order to give weird and incomprehensible colour to the consequences of the crime of Guinevere; and we may also remind ourselves with due reservation of Tennyson's remark to Mr. Knowles concerning "In Memoriam": "The general way of its being written was so queer that if there were a blank space I would put in a poem."

The year 1874 brings us to the long passage added to "Merlin and Vivien." Coleridge has described a speech of lago's as "The motive-hunting of a motiveless malignity." That description applies in part to these 150 lines. But in providing Vivien with questionable motive, Tennyson has brushed over the tinge of parable with some gaudy paint of allegory; she was born "Among the dead and sown upon the wind." 1885, the last year in this chronicle, gave us "Balin and Balan," which we may regard as another interpolation of motive. It was announced as "an introduction to 'Merlin and Vivien.'" It serves as an introduction both to "The Holy Grail" and to "Merlin and Vivien." It is a first attack on what may be called sensual religion, and being the latest written of the "Idylls," brings in Vivien less as a woman and more as an allegorical creation of "Sense at war with Soul." These words take us back to the year 1862, in which the poet makes avowal of some moral and allegorical method and purpose; for in the solemn "Dedication" of that year occurs the phrase, "My own ideal Knight," (subsequently altered to "my king's ideal knight"); and the same words take us on to the year 1872, when the graceful lines "To the Queen," were placed after the "Idylls It is in these lines that we find Tennyson's most explication awowal of allegory; the passage is well known; it begin "Accept this old imperfect tale . . "Although expressions of an allegorical intention almost as precise are foun scattered about the "Idylls," it is perhaps a pity that the poet turned commentator in this way; for critics have fastened upon the passage and made somewhat too much of it. Of course we must accept it, but with due discretion and some caution.

Much more is to be learnt from the poet; but only a few words may be added here. In the lines just referred to Tennyson implies that he does not approve of Malleor conception of King Arthur. Then he gives such a sketcl of his own times, "signs of storm," as remind us forcible of "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," and seem to furnish another reason for the introduction of "The Last Tourna ment," as well as for lines o to 28 of "The Passing of Arthur." The poet ends, however, as he usually does with a faint forecast of hope.

If may here be noticed that this "Dedication to the Clear," who speaks of the poem as complete, was followed to the control of the books; but when in 1885. The control of the control of and thin (1888)

2 In Chapter V. "Lockslev Ha" was a constant of set timents expressed in many constant of the set of set timents expressed in many constant of the set of set of the set of set of the set of th

Racket and and

(n) the state of t

&quot;Have we risen it a out the least then lask into the least again!"

Next we have to note that after 1842 the poem is never poken of as an epic; ' the latest title applied being Idylls of the King. In Twelve Books." And although alled "Books," the divisions of the poem have each of the po

Lastly, we return to Mr. Knowles, with whom Lord 'ennyson was accustomed to talk over the "Cycle of his Idylls,' to see how their treatment would come;" and to hom he dictated a prose sketch of "Balin and Balan" hich is referred to below. Mr. Knowles repeats the oet's own words: "By King Arthur I always meant the oul, and by the Round Table the passions and capacities of a man."

When Tennyson's biography comes to be written, we nay learn something more of the poet's dealings with his ubject. At present we are bound to collect and weigh uch fragments of external evidence as the foregoing, before we proceed to the more fascinating department of nternal evidence.

III. WHAT WE LEARN FROM THIS HISTORY. "Paradise Lost" was under contemplation for a very long period; not with the exception of one passage, and a few details, he poem was written in from five to six years, and was under revision for two years longer. If, as Tennyson ays in the "Holy Grail" volume, "The Passing of Arthur" was earliest written, and the project of the poem dso was early, we may set down some fifty years as the period of the composition of the "Idylls of the King." According to the poet's own showing, his mode of treatment varied from "Homeric echoes" to "The True and he False," from that to the sketching an "ideal knight," and from that again to the "Shadowing" of "Sense at war with Soul."

<sup>1</sup> Excepting in the peet's conversations with his friends. Otherwise the work is styled "These Idylls" ("Dedication to the Prince Concort"). "This old imperfect tale" ("To the Queen").

Legend, early epic, parable, allegory, mediaval romanthe modern moral—all these may be traced in the development of one of the characters, King Arthur.

As regards the introductory and personal verses, he "King Arthur" in "The Epic" of 1842; then he becom "my own ideal knight" in 1862; and he shadows sen at war with soul in the epilogue of 1872.

And more or less throughout the "Idylls" he preser these varying phases of character. Moreover, this hol true of many of the personages who move about the kin

But these inconsistencies are not confined to the chracters; they are abundantly evident in the narrati itself. The early ballads are purely romantic in treatmer "Morte d'Arthur" is romance dressed in the robes of ear epic, often to be recognized by a single line—"Authori forgets a dying king" The first four idylls are writte while the poet is still studying his problems of women their relation to men; and the later allegorical idy reflect the period of "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After. In fact, as hinted already, we have before us something the medley of "The Princess"; the difference is of degrather than of kind; and these new difficulties must be dealt with much as in Chapter VII.

Therefore from the poet himself in the first instance and then from the briefest glance at his poems, we gath evidence adverse to any opinion that the "Idylls" for an epic of recognized type; we also discover under sever aspects a want of absolute uniformity of treatment; at the blemish appears to be due most of all to the fact the the poem was "at first tentative, was so long in hand."

<sup>1</sup> By this -before the reading was changed—Tennyson meant Arthur his self. "Arthur" was first in his mind; and only thus could he pay the hig compliment to The Prince Consort, who serves moveover as a model if the poet while he sketches his blameless king. The change to "my king ideal knight" was made necessary by later additions to "The Idylls."

&lt;sup>2</sup> These views will be enlarged in the next section.

<sup>3</sup> See Appendix to this Chapter.

IV. SOME FURTHER CONSIDERATIONS. (a) The Form the Poem. We have now to strengthen this first impression of inconsistency by examining more closely the ading features of the "Idylls of the King;" and we will be significantly by glancing at the style of the poem. To this division of our subject the Appendix already mentioned will gain serve as a convenient introduction; for the latter art deals with another blemish, closely allied to irregurity of structure; a wavering treatment of subject exercing over as many as fifty years must tend to impair symmetry of outward form.

It is scarcely possible to over-estimate the importance ttaching to form and finish in a long poem; the unity of ffect produced by the epic or dramatic genius which has een great enough and fortunate enough to preserve niformity of design and treatment, is so far-reaching as a include the rhythm of a single line. What charms us nost in a work of art is the degree in which it manifests the creative presence of the artist operating intensely hroughout, so that the smallest detail glows with the neat of his imagination, and, moreover, is made rememberable 2 because of its exquisite relation to every other detail and to the whole. It is this which gives to "Paralise Lost" what Matthew Arnold has called its "unfailing evel of style."

We are told that by way of explanation Lord Tennyson remarked to a friend that the first and last of his twelve books were intentionally made more archaic than the other ten known as the "Round Table." If this were the case, the explanation might be regarded as tending to prove that the poet had made his task an easier one; for he must have noticed that his earliest fragment, the "Morte D'Arthur," was obviously archaic when compared with many other parts of his work, and required to supported in some way.

Some further remarks under this head will be found on p. 54.
 See also Introduction to Chapter XIV.

But it has not been supported in the way he has dicated. Apart from the question, why should the f and last books be more archaic than the rest, we may content with noticing first that they are not consisten archaic beyond the others; they contain the sa anachronisms, triplets, inconsistencies of style, and cl racters, and events; but also, as a fact, "The Coming Arthur" is not nearly so archaic as "The Passing Arthur"; and, what is more striking and more importe to our purpose, "The Passing of Arthur" contains with itself passages totally different in style and sentime from what may be called the central portion, the "Mor D'Arthur" of 1842. Compare the rhythm of the following with that of any four lines in the earlier fragment:

"O me, be yon dark Queens in yon black boat, Who shrick'd and wail'd, the three whereat we gazed On that high day, when, clothed with living light, They stood before his throne in silence, friends. . ."

In the same way both the style and the sentiment the speech beginning "I found Him in the shining of the stars . . . ." may be contrasted with "The old order, changeth, yielding place to new. . . . ."

In connection with the question of a more archaic styl we may refer to Tennyson's inquiry in "The Epic,'

"Why bring the style of those heroic days?"

which reminds us just a little of "what style could suit? in "The Princess." But the words in "The Epic" hav an extended sense. The poet feared that "mere Homeri echoes" were "nothing worth"; that it was idle to re model models. The real point to consider is, how th re-modelling was effected. Virgil may be said to hav re-modelled Homer, and with good success. The idea past of epic or drama is seldom wholly consistent; and most cases it must be made enough real by a reference contemporary humanity.

On the other hand, it is no defence of Tennyson to ead that in modernizing his characters he had Malory represedent; for first, as in "The Princess," they are odernized only in part, and not consistently; whereas falory makes them mediæval and romantic throughout. Iso, the legends were nearer to Malory's own times—to its speech, his sentiments; for the mythical Prince Arthur his subject Kelts need scarcely be reckoned with in his connection.

Under the head of style, we may next draw attention Tennyson's mode of telling his story. The ordinary pic is introduced by ἄειδε, θεὰ. . . . or by "Cano," followed y "Musa, memora," or it is, "Sing, Heavenly Muse; id my song that I may tell," etc. Again, as in "The rincess," Tennyson chooses a kind of compromise between epic and narrative; the plan, namely, of disconnected stories told by more than one story-teller. Among parrators in the "Idylls," the poet of course takes the first place, but never in the first person; he is introduced as 'he that tells the tale." Otherwise we listen to Malory, Sir Percivale, or Sir Bedivere. Sometimes, again, we are left in doubt as to who the story-teller may be, or we are reminded, or again left in doubt, by a curious nterpolation. To whom, for example, does the poet refer n "The Coming of Arthur"-" Thereafter-as he speaks who tells the tale"? Sometimes, on the other hand, the reference is plainer: "He that told the tale in olden times" at the end of "Gareth and Lynette" is presumably Malory, and "he, that told it later" is presumably Tennyson. But these interpolations—and there are others—are curious and confusing.

Apart from some differences of style pointed out in the Appendix to this Chapter, Tennyson was entirely fortunate in his choice and treatment of verse. This alone makes any comparison of the "Idylls" with the "Fac Queene" misleading. The mazy murmuring of Spensing great poem has a wondrous beauty; but in a language I ours (as Shakespeare and Milton had the genius to cover), rhyme alone—to say nothing of stanza—is probal fatal to the dignity of a very great poem; it is too persistent obvious as a structural expedient; it cannot be disguise the bone frame of such metrical devices will stick the fact and there, however much you may try to cover with the flesh and form of rhythm; it makes impossif the finer and larger phrasing of blank verse, the labeyond the law.

Yet in this varyingly magnificent blank verse of t "Idylls," rhyming lines are sparingly admitted; som times they take the form of the "triplets of old time whose three lines rhyme together; otherwise only t first two rhyme, and the third line constitutes a refrai Other variations are to be met with in other songs th diversify the poem. Such songs seem foreign to the we recognized epic.\(^1\) Virgil tells us the minstrel's theme, b not his song; Milton makes his splendid hymns blar verse with the rest. \(^2\)Rhyme, again, would be too ligh it would impair the dignity of such a great poem a "Paradise Lost."

Lastly, a word may be said on the mystic changing year of the "Idylls." Though often a delightful device of the laureate's, and not unknown to old romance, the association of each important event with some appropriate season is a little too pronounced in Tennyson's poem. When Guinevere was married, "The sacred altar blossom's white with may." Lancelot had gone to fetch her in April—"the maiden spring." The birds "made melod

I It may almost be questioned whether songs are strictly appropriate tepic or even to narrative poetry of any kind. In drama, of course, they are assigned to a character who sings them. Otherwise they are merely repeate by the narrator.

branch and melody in mid air" when Gareth joyously tout for Camelot. And so it is throughout the story; storm was brewing when Vivien began to practise on Merlin; the last Tournament was fought in the

" And the wan day Went glooming down in wet and weariness."

ke Enoch Arden, Arthur returned

"All in a death-dumb autumn-dripping gloom."

he last weird battle was fought in the death-white mists winter; and at the close of all "The new sun rose, bringing the new year."

All this—and more that might be added—gives the pem an appearance of stiffness and unreality; and we unnot help suspecting that the seasons are forced upon the romance in order to make it a closer allegory of invidual or national life:

"Star of the morning, Hope in the sunrise, gloom of the evening, life at a close."—Vastness.

(b) The subject matter. From this brief consideration f the form of the poem we may now turn to as brief a cryey of the subject matter.

Our study of "The Princess" in Chapter VII. lends apport to the conjecture already put forward, that such a rief survey will be best obtained by tracing the development of one of the leading characters; for every influence of the poet's creative energy bears directly or indirectly in this development. And from what was discovered in the same chapter, we may also conclude that an examination of the one character will bring into full view any improbabilities or inconsistencies that may be inherent in the work as a whole.

But first we must do justice to the poet by remembering nat ideal conditions are to be assumed before, ideal criting can be fairly criticised. On the other hand, we must refer to the former division of this section, a remind ourselves that ideal conditions which held good the days of Malory may be inadmissible in our own day and further, that we may reject any ideal conditions that are not consistent throughout.

Again, as Ida served our purpose in "The Princes so in this instance we will select Guinevere. This me be a departure from the usual course; but, whate Tennyson meant Arthur to be, Guinevere is certain Queen of the tragedy; she, according to the poet, gove all the tragic issues; she is the dram of ill that corrulal the nobler metal to its own scandal.

We might, therefore, fairly entitle this section of chapter

"THE STORY OF QUEEN GUINEVERE."

(1) And first let us speak of the four women—En Vivien, Elaine, Guinevere. By the poet's own showing these are types of "The True and the False." The fore the salient features—and it may be added thus ear the distorted features—in the character of each will be do to this early device of contrast.

These women may be variously contrasted; the tr wife may be set over against the false wife, and the har of the cities against the lily maid of Astolat.

Or, as in the copy of "The True and the False," Vivi may be confronted by Enid; and then the Queen will moved to uneasy pity by Elaine. As pointed out Chapter V., these characters belong originally to the period of "Locksley Hall," and its multitude of lo problems. Viewed in this light, we can understand an exaggeration involved in their contrasts; we can understand why such a study as Vivien—a study that seems draw upon what the poet in "The Princess" has calle "strange experiences"—should claim a place in art at a Hence, also, we may understand why Geraint is over stupid and Arthur under-wise.

But most important it is to observe that in these first Idylls" we have illustrations of the ethics of "The rincess." To take one example: the maxim, "Work no nore alone," or "each fulfils defects in each," will explain ne poet's treatment of Guinevere. Ida, as the opposite to Guinevere, fulfils defects in the Prince; and while Arthur s left to work alone, the Prince and the Princess his reference to the intended husband of Ida leads us to ompare him with the husband of Guinevere; and we hall notice many resemblances. Arthur is introduced to s in the very first "Idyll" as a man "Vext with waste reams." These are the "waking dreams" that vexed the Prince in "The Princess," dreams which only a selfacrificing woman could kill; and in each poem, although t might be well doubted whether the malady was curable, he woman has the task assigned to her in a somewhat rbitrary fashion:

> "Will walk this world Yoked in all exercise of noble end."

> " For saving I be joined To her that is the fairest under heaven, I seem as nothing in the mighty world, And cannot will my will nor work my work Wholly."

We might well fancy Guinevere's scornful reply:

"Poor boy," she said; "can he not read? no books? Quoit, tennis, ball; no games? nor deals in that Which men delight in, martial exercise?" The Princess.

But here we are admonished of those ideal conditions which we must be prepared to accept. We do accept hem, and shall not refer to them again; nor again, as in he present instance, shall we expressly show that they are inconsistent.

<sup>1</sup> Dreams, as was noticed elsewhere, that veved the poet himself.

In this case Arthur must bear witness against himself

"And all this throve until I wedded thee," a contradiction that the poet has not evaded by the late reading.

"And all this throve before I wedded thee."

What it was that throve may be learnt from the contex and from many another passage.1

(2) But Guinevere was married to so many Arthurs how could she please them all? Some have been glance at already; they must now be regarded more attentively There is no Keltic chieftain among them, but there is th Arthur of mediæval romance, whom we all love—him of the old Morte D'Arthur, ideal knight, Flos Regum, ever inch a king. There was also this dreamer, vext with waste dreams,

"A moral child, without the craft to rule," as Vivien had called him; faultily faultless, wanting warmth and colour, as Guinevere had judged him; the

"To hear high talk of noble deeds
As in the golden days before thy sin,"

or again:

"Until it came, a kingdom's curse, with thee."

After protesting that all was well before Guinevere came, the king argue ("Guinevere") that all will go ill now that her guilt is discovered:

"For which of us, who might be left, could speak," etc.

Guinevere,

in other words, the mischief spread by the story over a dozen years, would begin from that present.

But of course when "The Coming of Arthur" was written, the poet found it advisable to differ from Malory, and from his own previous statements and allow Arthur to effect little or nothing before his marriage.

It is also worthy of notice, that when all the battles had been fought, and the king's opinion of his knights was most favourable, and his confidence it Guinevere still unshaken (see "The Holy Grail," passim), he was more that ever vexed with "visions of the night or of the day." The malady therefore as we have already ventured to judge, was exceedingly difficult of cure, or perhaps incurable.

impeccable prig" of Mr. Swinburne; the Arthur of the econd Locksley Hall.

But in fairness to the poet we should hear in some of hese opinions an echo of the scoffing of the scribes, "He nath Beelzebub"; and having taken into account a few light differences, we look next on Tennyson's most proninent idea, the Christ-like Arthur:

"No man,
But Michael trampling Satan."
The Last Tournament.

Achilles, Ulysses, Æneas, Beatrice, Satan, all move at imes through the golden mist; and we also love this Arthur of Tennyson's favourite motto, "Be ye perfect." He moves in pure severity of perfect light, a great reformer, divine and human,

"In whom high God hath breathed a secret thing," nman not easily to be loved by woman, not to be loved at all in this world by such a woman as Guinevere; yet from her, as from Princess Ida, the poet extorts a confession quite foreign to her nature and her case:

> "It was my duty to have loved the highest; It surely was my profit, had I known."

Much truer to the story are those other words of Guinevere:

"But who can gaze upon the sun in heaven?"

There is yet another Arthur; him also Tennyson de-

1 Common to Tennyson's "Arthur" and to Christ, are mystic origin and lestiny, and men's doubt concerning it:

"From the great deep to the great deep he goes" which belongs to the "De Profundis" period; not to that of "Morte D'Arthur"), a spotless character ("in him was no guile"), the scoffing of man, the going about doing good, ceaseless struggle with evil, reforming zeal, seeming failure, the agony ("My God, thou hast forgotten me in my death."—The Passing of Arthur). To these may be added the mysterious passing way, and a mysterious coming again. The precedent of Christ to a large extent modified Tennyson's conception of "Arthur."

lighted to honour; he is the "modern gentleman Of state liest port" of the Epilogue to "Morte D'Arthur." An others might be recognized, most of whom would be "A noble type Appearing ere the times were ripe."

But to speak generally of all the various aspects of the central figure of the poem, we may venture to add that Lord Tennyson's remark to Mr. Knowles-"By Kin Arthur I always meant the soul," might perhaps, withou presumption, be altered to "By King Arthur I graduall came to mean the soul." If the poet had not incorporate his "Morte D'Arthur" of 1842 into "The Passing of Arthur" of 1872, we should have had less difficulty i understanding his statement. And as the remainder of the last book of the twelve was adapted to the old income porated fragment which, as already seen, represente Arthur more purely as a hero of romance, it follows that the poet's remark applies less closely to the last book of his poem than it does to the others. For example, in th very first book of the "Idylls" (1872), readers of Tenny son will easily discover for themselves that Arthur i "more than man." And it has already been noticed that the line in "The Coming of Arthur."

" From the great deep to the great deep he goes,"

was repeated in the passages added to the "Mort D'Arthur" in 1872.

Next we will observe the manner of the wooing. In Lancelot's failure was the misfortune of circumstances of yet more truly was Guinevere's. When Arthur rod by her castle walls, "She saw him not, or mark'd not she saw." A rumour even ran that she took Lancelot for the king.

<sup>1</sup> Earlier reading, "She took him for the King." Present reading, "rumour runs, she took him for the king."

the sighed to find her journey with Lancelot done. As the king, she "Thought him cold,

High, self-contained, and passionless, not like him,
Not like my Lancelot."

She did not choose Arthur; she was chosen in spite of nerself; and the result was disaster. For a commentary we may refer once more to "The Princess," "Man to command, and woman to obey." Elaine, on the other hand, "being so very wilful," did choose Lancelot, and with little enough ground for her choice; and yet our sympathies are with Elaine rather than with Guinevere.

(3) We now approach the main subject—Queen Guinevere as responsible for the great catastrophe; and it shall be stated in none other words than her own:

"The sombre close of that voluptuous day Which wrought the ruin of my lord the king."

But not of the king only:

"For now the Heathen of the Northern Sea, Lured by the crimes and frailties of the Court, Begin to slay the folk and spoil the land."

"The Idylls" are usually regarded as the history of a king and a kingdom that were ruined through the fault of one woman; and if the poem is viewed as an allegory, the story is yet the same, and must be consistent. This woman, as we understand,

"Like another Helen fired another Troy;"

or she was another beautiful, baneful Eve who lost us another Eden. And in the two quotations above, she has pronounced plain judgment upon herself.

Neve theless, those who read the poem with more than ordinary attention, may perhaps discover that this, the very framework of the story, is fabricated throughout of improbabilities, contradictions, and impossibilities. What the poet meant is one thing, but his means of effecting it are quite another thing. The case against Guinevere; conducted without any show of fairness or reason; the verdict is by no means supported by the evidence. And briefly, the fact is, that just as in many other long poems, so in this, Tennyson's ethical intention spoilt his story. The ethical intention was good; but it was to be exhibited in a work of art; and as the ethical intention was constantly permitted to mar the beauty and impressivenes of the work of art, both ethics and art are reduced to a lower level. This was not the case in "The Æneid, in the "Divine Comedy," nor in "Paradise Lost."

The story itself, or something like it, might have been a very good one. Viewed broadly, it tells of the ever renewed war between good and evil:

"Evolution ever climbing after some ideal good, And Reversion ever dragging Evolution in the mud."

It is the constantly recurring history of the individual the seldomer but not less common rise, culmination, and decline of a nationality.<sup>2</sup> But as applied to a court, whatever that may be, and to such a court as that of the Keltic or Mediæval Prince, we scarcely know how to take the legend thus recast by Tennyson, especially as it further concerned itself with Arthur's kingdom, whatever that may have been:

"All my realm Reels back into the beast."

For, first, these knights of a new as opposed to "that old knight-errantry," were bound by vows that made them almost a monastic order; and yet, under the circumstances, their pristine utter purity is as improbable as heir subsequent wholesale corruption—a corruption, we may repeat, that is sometimes spread over the whole singdom.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The Princess," the two "Locksley Hall's." "Maud," "Aylmer's Field," "The Promise of May."

<sup>2</sup> Its moral appears in many a line of Tennyson: e.g., as quoted above, "Have we risen from out the beast, then back into the beast again?"

&lt;sup>3</sup> For example, Sir Gawain and Sir Modred were of their company; and Sir Kay was "the most ungentle knight in Arthur's Hall," and was disobedient to the king.

Next, we have seen that in "Morte D'Arthur" the Round Table is "the goodliest fellowship of famous knights," and an "image of the mighty world"; whereas ater, and in a manner at variance with Malory's explanation or Tennyson's first conception, it symbolizes "the passions and capacities of a man."

But whatever this Court, Round Table, or Kingdom may have been, it lasted, as we guess, some twelve years, and after having been gradually undermined by rumours of the love of Lancelot and Queen Guinevere, it fell with a crash when their love was detected.

This may appear plausible enough at first sight; but a closer examination of the twelve books seems to prove that scarcely a single effect in this long history of ruin can be traced to any clear or sufficient cause; rumour always strangely lives or as strangely dies; and even the "Detection of Guinevere" is on many sides unsupported by the circumstances.

To make this plain would demand an elaborate analysis of each Idyll and the comparison of a very large number of passages. On the other hand, fragments of evidence such as might be brought forward in a short commentary would be altogether inconclusive and misleading. Even the middle course of examining more closely some one or two links in the chain of evidence must be attended with grave disadvantages; but as it is the only one open to us we propose to deal with not more than the story of Vivien; and we choose this with a purpose, for the incident of Balin and the testimony of Merlin are the weightiest evidence brought into court by the prosecution.

We will even begin by making a concession to the adversary, and attempt to date back the love of Lancel and Guinevere to the time when they rode together in the boyhood of the year on their way to Camelot. It was long ride; Lancelot had left among the flowers in Apand he returned among the flowers in May. Day aft day they rode, rapt in sweet talk; and although it suit the poet in this connection to assure us that as yet no seem was dreamed, nevertheless in other passages where he less guarded this ride is looked back to as to the beginning of love:

<sup>1</sup> The flight of time is seldom clearly marked in "The Idylls."

"Prince, we have ridden before among the flowers."

"As once of old-among the flowers-they rode."

They rode, and during that long ride together the tasted surely of the magic cup. For our thoughts wande to that other twain of kindred beautiful romance whi journeyed on the same errand, and were bound by the same hopeless love.

It is noon in some delicious dale; the silk pavilions of King Arthur are raised for brief repast; the wine-cup placed upon the board; they pledge each other, Lanceke and Guinevere. And now, as they ride forth once more our ears in fancy listen to the words that tremble from hilps, and catch the faltering syllables of her reply:

"Holy Mother, by thy Child-God save me From this fever of a bliss not mine!— Lady, 'twas a charmed cup we tasted— Lady, there is poison in that wine!"

"Nay, sir knight, what answer should I yield thee? (Jesu-Mary-shield me from my shame!)
Lancelot—nay—I perish with my passion, Feel—ah God—like thee—the wizard flame."

* * * *

Our glance must also be turned for a moment upon th second poem, "Gareth and Lynette." From two or thre passages we gather that some years have past, and not Sir Kay warns Lancelot:

"That thine own fineness, Lancelot, some fine day Undo thee not."

Certainly, as we have just inferred, the love of Lancelot d Guinevere dates from that memorable ride; but what 1 Sir Kay know about it? The court is spoken of as solutely pure. Gareth found nothing but purity there. In "The Marriage of Geraint," which we may presume yet later event, "A rumour rose about the Queen . . . " d in "Geraint and Enid," Geraint at first does not rest well contented as "Before the Queen's fair name was eathed upon"; yet a little later "He rested well content at all was well." The spiteful whisper died. And, what very significant, he crowned a happy life of at least veral years, and more probably of many years' fighting battle for the blameless King. What is to be said out the rumour after that lapse of time?

We now come to "Balin and Balan," and in this poem alin, like Gareth before him and Pelleas after him, is rmitted to move about the court; and, like them, he ars nothing whatever of any rumour. But he is peritted to see (what apparently no one else had seen, and hat he discovered to no one else but his brother) the eye Lancelot dwell upon the Queen and her hue change beeath the earnest gaze. He seems to be doubtful as to any onstruction that might be placed upon the interview; but, aming his troublesome temper, and mad for strange lventure, he dash'd away. And although he never heard much as a whisper at Arthur's court, he is told at the ourt of Pellam:

"This fair wife-worship cloaks a secret shame."

et again Balin dismisses his doubts, and turns fiercel oon his anger:

> "O me, that such a name as Guinevere's Which our high Lancelot hath so lifted up

<sup>1</sup> Other passages suggest a considerable interval.

And been thereby uplifted, should thro' me, My violence, and my villainy, come to shame."

These words he addressed to Vivien, and she had mu more to tell him; but, as "she lied with ease," her slane would not have been mentioned here but for the fact to it brought to Balin's mind "that dark bower at Camelo and revived his doubts. Yet he told Vivien nothing abthem. As to the rest of the story, the brothers die believ the Queen innocent. But two points are to be noted; o that Balin's doubts were revived not by substantial rum but by sheer falsehood, and the other that the poet ran the remarks of Vivien as evidence. How clearly he tended this may be understood from the prose version for after the death of the brothers, Vivien "sped stealth away to King Mark, and after to Arthur's court, and th she told how she had overheard from Knights of Arthu Table scandal beyond all disproof about Sir Lancelot a Queen Guinevere. And thus in truth the 'Doloro Stroke'2 was struck which first shook to its base stately order of the Table Round."

From this Idyll therefore it appears that, in spite of conclusions of the prose version and of whatever corrition or whatever rumour prevailed at Arthur's corvivien knew nothing about them; nor does she kn anything at the opening of the second paragraph of next Idyll, "Merlin and Vivien."

But strange as are all these proceedings of Vivien, a the dramatic use the poet expects to make of them, I actions and their relation to the tragedy are in "Mer and Vivien" stranger still. This was to be expected, as explained above, the poem when first written had purpose more moral than dramatic.

Again the rumour comes from without, as in the case the Red Knight. Mark hears a minstrel sing of cert.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Aspects of Tennyson," "Nineteenth Century," January, 1893.

Title of the prose version of "Balin and Balan," ediæval, Platonic, supersensual notions prevailing at thur's court:

> "To worship woman as true wife beyond All hopes of gaining."

After a conversation with Mark that is abhorrent, vien sets out for Camelot on her mission of absolute ischief; and we must be careful to notice that the scene her exploits is not to be a corrupt or even a corruptible urt, but one in which men are "passionate for an utter rity." Nor is it to the knights alone that she imputes her vn evil nature: "This Arthur pure! . . . . There is no ing pure." At present, therefore, it is not the guilt of uinevere that makes Vivien possible. This is a very portant point. All the evidence adduced up to the esent proves that the court is pure, and it is this utter urity that attracts Vivien.

She arrives at a time of golden rest. The heathen lie Arthur's feet. (Spite of Guinevere, therefore, thus much the King's purpose has been fulfilled.) After long pryg, and without making any warrantable discovery, she ows one ill hint from ear to ear and leaves death in the ving waters. But the court was decent; the knights eard and let her he; therefore she hated the knights and et herself to practise upon Merlin.

"Set up the charge," says Merlin, "to stand or fall." In reply to her charge Merlin makes some doubtful dmissions, but in the older edition adds:

> "Sir Lancelot went ambassador at first To fetch her, and she took him for the king; She fixt her fancy on him; let him be."

Later he is convinced that there is no truth in her ccusations generally, for-

"She cloaks the scar of some repulse with lies; I well believe she tempted them and fail'd. . . . "1

<sup>1</sup> A few words remain to be added respecting the evidence supplied by Jerlin. He is the first to give any support to the rumour-or rather to the

Hence we understand that the poet's purpose has been be to expose Guinevere than to paint Vivien.

Now Merlin had dreamt<sup>1</sup> that the King's high purpowas "broken by the worm"—by Vivien, that is, and iby Guinevere. Guinevere loves in secret, but her love falsely true; and the passage added in 1874 only shifts more of the blame on Vivien, and by no means disclosany demoralization in the court. On the contrary, it Vivien who calls upon us to follow her through the fit flood, and not Guinevere.

(4) And now we have to notice the fact that other cause besides the sin of Guinevere are assigned to this ruin king and kingdom. Indeed, if we refer to "Mod'Arthur," Guinevere had nothing whatever to do with There—and it is much the same in Malory—the cat of downfall is rebellion; that, and nothing else. perish by this people which I made!" is Arthur's any rumour of a rumour; and that support, as we have just seen, is aln wholly withdrawn. Moreover, he dies soon after. Apart from this, I was it, again, that Balla had heard nothing; that Pelleas afterwards he nothing, although he had been according to Percival's showing—"On our free-spoken Table."? How was it that the rumour which reached M was not of scandal, but of mediavad woman-worship? How is it that in next "IdyII"—in which however the contradictions are much more merous—"Lancelot and Guinevere" are set before the world in a new lation:

"Our knights, at feast, Have pledged us in this union, while the king Would listen smiling."

Nor can Merlin's estimate of the "Round Table" be altogether tr worthy:

"My friends of old, All brave, and many generous, and some chaste."

Modred had received no meed of bravery; and purity among the knig has appeared in every previous reliable line of the poem.

<sup>4</sup> In this dream is Tennyson's own "moral" of the poem; it should compared with "Tooksley Hall Sixty Years Affer," to which it is near date.

lamation to Sir Bedivere; and this making of a people ally explained in "The Coming of Arthur." The true times are only just dead; the sequel of to-day, that I that alone, unsolders the goodly fellowship of knights. It is is still the impression left on the mind even when we read the additions in "The Passing of Arthur," luding those that were made in 1872; for, by a possible resight, the poet allows Sir Bedivere to listen to the values of disaster—a traitorous wife and friend, a lim that reels back into the beast, and the rest—but rertheless retains all the original passage, and makes the King Arthur and Sir Bedivere act and speak throughthe remainder of the poem as though Guinevere and neelot had never been heard of.

But not only Guinevere and Lancelot, for the Holy ail has to be reckoned with as another cause of the despread ruin. To begin with, it had long ago destroyed ne-tenths of that goodly fellowship of knights which, cording to Sir Bedivere, were nevertheless unsoldered "the sequel of to-day." No doubt Tennyson had more an one reason for writing the Holy Grail into his series poems. It was in the book of Malory, it was most mous among legends, it enabled the poet to paint on a reger canvas the St. Agnes and Sir Galahad of former ars, and would serve as another opportunity for comming religious enthusiasts. Perhaps it would relieve uinevere of some of this enormous burden of working nfusion in the Table Round, or at least serve both bring into stronger relief the effect of her crime,

For St. Simeon a place was found in "Balin and Balan," as King

&lt;sup>2</sup> Against extravagance of any kind in religion, he raised his voice to the st, as in the somewhat inartistic line of "The Northern Cobbler".—"An uggins'e preäch'd o' Hell-fire an' the loov o' God für men." Even "Rizpah' in some danger of being spoilt by the two stanzas beginning "Election, lection and Reprobation."

and be at the same time a secondary cause of c fusion.1

But here again we are in doubt; for, first, the H Grail is never mentioned together with Guinevere as influence for evil or a cause of disaster. And in the Idevoted to this fascinating legend we read that the H Cup left the world because of the sin of the world; the might be expected to return only when the world I become pure; that when the Holy Thing did come again the arose a hope that all the world might be healed; the King pronounced it "A sign to maim this Order who I made," and that as the knights rode away on their quite Queen shrieked aloud:

"This madness has come on us for our sins."

Therefore the Holy Grail legend as employed by Ten son presents strange contrasts; nor can the opinion Guinevere be accepted by anyone who reads the po attentively; nor was the Holy Quest a last effort religion, amid general demoralization; apart from ot abundant evidence, the king says expressly that his knig are all men "With strength and will to right the wrong and he rejoices in his Table Round; and a better relig had prevailed from the first-the "Cross and Tab. Nor, as we have mentioned, is the quest of the Grail as where cited as a consequence or an auxiliary of the of Guinevere; for instance, although its results are disastrous, no word of it is heard in Arthur's parting spee to Guinevere, nor in "The Passing of Arthur." But, or introduced, Tennyson was obliged to make the search the Grail an evil, not a good; the story could not ha been worked in otherwise.

(5) This subject must be left not more than touch upon as we turn to the remaining consideration that arises

&lt;sup>1</sup> In "Malory," Arthur is troubled only because he knows how many g knights must be lost in the quest.

t of this long history of crime. Speaking broadly, was probable that such widespread and various evil should due to rumour so vague and so contradictory, but ore, was it possible that for twelve years at least the king ould have dwelt in the midst of this rumour, a witness all its supposed effects, and yet have no suspicion of it natever? That Malory put this question to himself pears from his remark, "For, as the French book saith, e king had a deeming"; and that Tennyson was not haware of the difficulty is seen in the following readings: 2 "Enid and Nimuë" the important line runs thus:

"And troubled in his heart about the Queen."

nis, in "The True and the False: Four Idylls of the ing," is corrected to, "Vext at a rumour rife about the ueen,"—and this line kept its place till 1874. As to the ading adopted in that year,

"Vext at a rumour issued from herself, Of some corruption crept among his knights," e need only say that conjecture as to what it means—king all circumstances into consideration—is entirely offled; but it may be noticed that the rumour, as in so any other instances, proceeds from the malignant lips a stranger.

We can easily understand why the poet should delay e discovery—at least on Arthur's part:

"Man-is he man at all, who knows and winks?"

We may as well remark here upon the startling fact that no proof was theoming till all the mischief had been done; we may further remark that e rumour remains rumour to the very last, proceeds mostly from a foreign urce, and never becomes "The world's loud whisper breaking into orm." for in spite of the "open shame" spoken of by the Lord of Astolat of the Pelleas, it appears so late as in "Guinevere" as a "smouldering andal" that only may

&quot;Break and blaze
Before the people, and our lord the king."

&lt;sup>2</sup> These existed before "Balin and Balan" was added in the expectation making the matter clearer.

was Vivien's old insinuation; and Tennyson is determined to combat Malory's looser doctrine, and to insist on the principle set forth with undue emphasis in "Guinevere," in the passage beginning:

"I hold that man the worst of public foes. . . . "

In all this he is more concerned with the interests of modern society than with those of his poem.

But why should Guinevere bear so much of the blame? How much may be gathered from many passages; but the utter severity of the poet is best discovered by the word he prints in italics in the following:

> "That she is woman, whose disloyal life Hath wrought confusion in the Table Round."

In a story older still, the woman who had sinned sought pity, if not pardon, in her plea, "The serpent tempted me, and I did eat." And in Malory, at the close of the volume, we read as follows:—"When Sir Lancelot was brought to her, then she said to all the ladies, 'Through this man and me hath all this war been wrought." In other respects Malory is more impartial than Tennyson, for the queen dismisses Lancelot against his will.

Tennyson's is the old doctrine that allows man license, and woman none. This may be seen by a comparison of his assurance to Lancelot,

"Never yet
Could all of true and noble in knight and man Twine round one sin," with all that long strange speech" that the King spoke to the Queen, who grovelled at his feet:

"Yet must I leave thee, woman, to thy shame. . . ."

<sup>1</sup> This admission on the part of Guinevere would be misleading if we did not remember that in Malory the Queen's offence is treason rather than unfaithfulness.

<sup>22</sup> Inter alia, the King, who test of all had contemplated giving his Queen over to "the flaming death, often employs language that belongs to the loftiest ideal of modern civilisation."

Lancelot is left with a future before him. There is no ope for Guinevere in this world.<sup>2</sup>

"The woman is so hard upon the woman." So Tennyson ad written in "The Princess." But here it is the man—ne poet—who is so hard upon the woman. And if space ermitted it might be shown more clearly that as a conequence he has destroyed almost all the probabilities of is story. Once more, the intense ethical purpose that we first associated with the "Locksley Hall" period, and hat showed itself most plainly in the first four "Idylls," was forced into the poem to the very last, and continued a spoil its art.

Following the course taken in the chapter on "The rincess," we have thus been led to notice some apparent efects in the construction of "The Idylls of the King." t is held by most critics that the ten stories with their rologue and epilogue possess a certain unity which makes ne whole poem truly epic in its grandeur and completeses; some find this unifying element in the gradually eveloped story of one great sin and its spreading taint; thers in the moral purpose that pervades the poem; and thers again in the seeming fact that every episode, inident, and personage is bound up with the fortunes of King Arthur.

But it is certainly doubtful whether Tennyson has succeeded in making his twelve "Idylls" veritable members f an organic whole, so that the cycle of them may bear ne immortal name of Epic. The mode of composition f the "Idylls," the frequent and long interruptions, the oet's habit of construction as seen in other poems, his octrine concerning long poems, a distrust of his own bility to produce the highest work of sustained effort; is first thought of writing "a whole great poem," the name epic that he then associated with it, the adverse criticism, combined with his own conviction, that forced him to be contented with semi-isolated stories; the other fact that ultimately he set himself to modify the construction and arrangement of his stories so that they might become parts of a unifying main plot; that he added to the number of them until it reached the mystic twelve; and again the fact that he still called his stories by their names, nor ever gave to his work a more ambitious title than "Idylls"-all this has been touched upon. And to this we may now add, as on our own part, that during a very long period of development the poet's treatment of his subject grew less romantic and more moral or more allegorical, until the intrusion of ethical design destroyed the symmetry of his creation; that, as a further consequence, the story sometimes wants swiftness and coherence, and the characters a dramatic reality; that some of the episodes appear too loosely attached to the body of the organism to be called its members, and that others, if members, seem to be redundant. But at this point we find ourselves compelled to resort to historical and comparative methods: or, rather, we are led back to our starting-point—the future Addison and his successors.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Therefore, Sir Lancelot, go to thy realm, and there take thee a wife, and live with her in joy and bliss. . . ."—Malory.

<sup>3 &</sup>quot;Mine will ever be a name of scorn."—Guinevere.

To those, however, who urge that Tennyson's "Idylls" have all the epic grandeur, we counter-urge that epic completeness must be recognized before epic grandeur can be admitted.

And now, as in the Chapter on "The Princess," whatever may be the value of this inquiry into the unity of the poem as related to the breadth of its conception, there is yet to be added a reference to the truth, the beauty, the magnificence of the parts. Such a poem as Guinevere might almost be regarded as an epic in miniature; "The Holy Grail" has all the dim rich splendour of a gothic cathedral. But the space at our disposal for praising the "Idylls of the King" is very limited, and yet it need not be larger; for we have merely to question whether, when Shakespeare and Milton have been placed apart, there can be found in our English literature a more considerable poetical achievement than the Arthurian poems of Tennyson.

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER XI.

From "New Studies in Tennyson."

I venture to think that many critics of the Poet Laureate have allowed zeal for his well-earned honour to blunt their sense of the honour due to other great masters of song. If, therefore, I seem harsh, or even unjust, in some of my remarks, I must ask you to say of me, "It was not that he loved Tennyson less, but that he loved Shakespeare and Milton more."

Indeed, my lecture may very well begin with a caution. For in some recent reviews that I have brought with me, I find Lord Tennyson constantly bracketed with Shakespeare: and as to Milton, he is included in a list of eight other poets who have gained the favour of one of these reviewers, but with this exception, no mention is made of him.

Now I wish strongly to protest against this careless use of Shakespeare's name, and this equally careless omission of Milton's; and, remember, I speak of a prevailing tendency. In spite of our modern aversion to comparative criticism, I shall be bold enough to assert that we English possess two poets of the very first class, and only two—Shakespeare and Milton; and if we graduate the scale evenly, we shall probably find no poet at all to place in the second class, although there are several who may take rank in a third. But this, you will say, is going too far.

I do not think so. However, Chaucer, Spenser, Lord Tennyson and the rest shall form a second class, if you will; and further, if you will, Lord Tennyson shall rank first in that second class. I shall be content, provided I check this tendency of our time to forget Milton, and to degrade Shakespeare. Degrade is exactly the word. Would you believe such appalling ignorance as this exhibited by a recent critic of considerable repute: "Shakespeare," he said, "and Sheridan, our two great dramatists."

By a similar fad of modern criticism, another critic of higher repute prefers "Comus" to "Paradise Lost," and the "Facrie Queene" to either. I am sure you will not wish me to make any further comment on such strange notions.

And why, it will be asked, are Shakespeare and Milton the two, and the only two, very great poets in our English literature? To answer that question fully would be impossible here. For although I intend to examine Tennyson's claim to poetic greatness under the three heads of Epic, Dramatic, and Lyric poetry-and in this order-I shall nevertheless say little or nothing that is not suggested to me in the pages of these reviews as I turn them over. I will, however, briefly explain, that word, image, foot, line, stanza, song, epic, drama, and the rest are some of them structural elements in forms of poetical expression, and some of them forms of poetical expression in themselves —the epic and the drama <sup>2</sup> being generally regarded as the greatest of these forms. Now I will call your attention to one quality of the best work produced by the two artists, Shakespeare and Milton; it is on the largest, the grandest scale. In certain works of art, magnitude contributes most of all to the sum total of pleasing impressions; conversely, to create on this great scale is often the highest effort and the highest achievement of genius.

Apart from other differences, the difference of form is beyond calculation. See Chapter XIV.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The question whether under ordinary circumstances drama is a fit subject for poetic treatment was reserved for a second lecture.

But the grandeur of the whole lends grandeur to each part. This incidental remark is not exactly a step in the direction of my argument, yet I am glad that the words have been uttered, for they give me an opportunity of telling you something that came under my notice a few years ago -a phenomenon that does bear directly on my argument. Well, it was this: some years ago literary experts and others were invited to send to one of our leading magazines their favourite passages of poetry. To the editor's hand there came extracts from almost any English poet-if I may trust my memory-except Shakespeare and Milton. I seem to remember also that the modern poets were most in favour, and that if Shakespeare was represented two or three times, scarcely any contributor cared to take a few lines from Milton. I cannot understand this. I should have thought there was really no choice in the matter. Two pieces, as I think, were sent up by each authority. What could one possibly be supposed to do in such a case other than select from Shakespeare-it might be the storm scene in "Lear," the dialogue between Othello and Iago, or that between Brutus and Cassius; and from Milton, the Morning Hymn of Adam and Eve, the description of Eden, Satan's address to the Sun, and so forth. Now, if we choose the marvellous storm-scene in "Lear," or the Morning Hymn -for which no epithet is found in earthly language-we do this, as I have suggested already, not only because the part is excellent in itself, but also, and much more, because it borrows wondrous strength and beauty from every other part, and from the magnificent total of scheme and scope. Stupendous was the genius that created "King Lear" and "Paradise Lost." There were giants on the earth in those days.

That Tennyson knew what was required of a very great poet, is evident from the outset. He began his Epic in good time; the first fragment, "Morte d'Arthur," being published in 1842, and it had been in course of composition probably from a much earlier date; and although his dramas came very late, they were written with determination, and soon multiplied.

But if the young poet had made up his mind to attempt the highest poetic achievement by writing epic and drama, it seems equally clear that from the first he distrusted his capability of doing either. To use his own words, he had "a mint of reasons" for this. Later on he styled the first four books of his epic "Idylls," a title implying, amongst other things, that these four stories (now known as the third and fourth, the fifth, the sixth, and the eleventh) were more or less disconnected. This lack of epic completeness I shall refer to again.

As to Tennyson's dramatic works, they were at first monologues, monodramas, and the like experiments; or were such as "The Princess,"—"Medleys," full of the poet's apologies.

The same hesitation to attempt a very great work of artistic oneness may be traced in many other poems; for example, in the isolated sections of the "In Memoriam," where again apologies are numerous, and where we discover the significant utterance,

"Nor dare she trust a larger lay. . . ."

After doing full justice to the context, we cannot help reading the line as one amongst many of like import, whether in this work or in others. Even "Maud," the most successful of his earlier dramatic efforts, was con-

<sup>1</sup> See "The Epic."

<sup>2</sup> Spelt "Idyls" in earlier volumes. The spelling "Idyll," which is closer to the original Greek, once helped to distinguish the heroic descriptive poem from such pastorals as those of Theocritus. But the distinction has ceased to be maintained by such a means, and the later spelling of the term is new adouted without discrimination.

ructed in a tentative, desultory manner, and the various ditions of the poem prove that the author was for some me uncertain as to the real character of what he had reated.

Now, comparatively speaking, nothing is easier than to rite a poem on a small scale (hence the lyric has always unked lowest), or a poem that may end anywhere and nyhow, or that never ends at all; poems—(but again, erhaps, I ought to crave your indulgence if in my respect or our two great masters I cast a careless eye on lesser ritists; indeed, I am about to make a terrible onslaught n all such)—poems like the "Canterbury Tales" (never nished),

"Artistry's haunting curse, the incomplete" chough I do not wish to apply this quotation too closely); oems such as the "Faerie Queene" (again, never finished), The Essay on Man" (always a puzzle to its author), The Excursion" (part of a poem never finished), "Don uan" (which, if it "begins with a beginning," can hardly e said to end with an ending: "Nothing so difficult is a beginning In poesy, unless, perhaps, the end,") Childe Harold's Pilgrimage" (a unique example of accillating composition), "Endymion" (a series of "Rich vindows that exclude the light"), "The Revolt of Islam" And passages that lead to nothing"), the "In Memoriam" on which critics alone have given shape—

"If shape it might be called, that shape had none "; noems that were, so to speak, "allowed to write themelves," being more or less prolix, diffuse, pieces of patchwork, wanting proportion, lacking the well-known essentials of beginning, middle, and end, the end seen from the beginning, adjustment of parts to the magnificent whole, composite harmony; and of course they lack also eastness, they lack stupendous, concentrated, sustained, and successful effort, and with that they lack grandeur.

It is the custom of critics to argue that Tennyson' choice of what was easiest merely implied a meritoriou love of the simple; it was a characteristic simplicity, the tell us, that preferred the uncomplicated monologue t the complex drama, the short idyll to the long epic. Thei argument is easily disposed of. Had Shakespeare writte nothing but monologues and Milton nothing but idylls the later poet might have surpassed them both. As thing are, Shakespeare and Milton are great, and he in comparison is less great.

Even if Tennyson's "King Arthur" satisfied some of the requirements of a great epic poem, the fact that it was a first tentative, was so long in hand, tells terribly against in Making due allowance for change of theme, we seem to discover as much difference in point of style between the superb "Morte d'Arthur" and "Pelleas and Ettarre" a between "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained" and of course books I. to XII. of "Paradise Lost" exhibit the same "unfailing level of style"; the whole sublim poem being, in fact, wrought out by the blind poet in about six years.

Again, the change in style is all for the worse. "Morted'Arthur" was written while Tennyson still believed, and rightly, that Scott, Byron, and even Shelley had exhausted the charm of somewhat lawless vigour, and that the perfect form of Keats was to be the new and successful manner in poetry. In later years he seems to have placed less confidence in that belief.

It is a change, indeed, that we witness in most poet whose period of authorship is long—notably in Shake speare and Milton. Compare, for instance, "Juliu Cæsar" with "The Tempest," or "Paradise Lost" witl "Samson Agonistes." It comes of many years, the desir and need of change, weariness of struggle between impetuous thought and prescribed art form; it is a change that sometimes verges on license, not freedom; it in rupts, for example, with extra syllables, the stately vement of the blank verse:

"And so went back, and seeing them yet in sleep, Said, 'Ye that so dishallow the holy sleep."...

These two consecutive lines from "Pellcas and Ettarre" uld have been impossible in the "Morte d'Arthur." if we except them as forming a kind of couplet, and as ving a rhythm peculiar to themselves, I will choose the lowing two from the immediate context...

"Fingering at his sword-handle until he stood . . . And the sword of the tourney across her throat. . . ."

Many others you can find for yourselves in the same o short paragraphs; so many, that, as before, making owance for a lighter theme, we may yet reasonably gard the blank verse of the later poem as something ite different from that of the "Morte d'Arthur," and as arking a tendency towards undue license.

The same phenomenon is seen when we compare Locksley Hall "with "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After"; id, more generally, in the many lighter measures of the aureate's later poems.

The defence set up by reviewers, that we must consider e "Idylls" as a modern Faerie Queene, serves finally establish my conclusion, that if the chief test of a poet's eatness be greatness, the production, we will say, of at ast one very great and perfect work, then Tennyson ils to rank as a poet of the very first order; we may ot concede to him superlative grandeur, unfaltering rength, nor, as in Shakespeare's case, the freshness also funconscious genius.

CHAPTER XII.

"BALLADS, AND OTHER POEMS."1

THIS volume of 184 pages took the public by surprise 1880, and the surprise was a delightful one. Everybo welcomed the appearance of a collection of poems, balla lyrics, idylls, and monologues like those of earlier year which brought his first fame to the poet. And the n poems showed no signs of weakness; on the contrat though less lavishly adorned they had more drama power. This might have been expected, for most of the were written at a time when Tennyson was hard at we on his drama. It may be added that the Ballads, would be inferred from the title, are a special feature the volume.

(499) "TO ALFRED TENNYSON, MY GRANDSON" Glorious poet" reminds us of Longfellow, who call children "living poems," in much the same spirit Byron's when he apostrophised the stars as the "poet of heaven." As in others of Tennyson's verses for ch dren, the lines all rhyme together.

(499). "THE FIRST QUARREL" is the first amor

 $<sup>^{1}</sup>$   $^{\alpha}$  The Lover's Tale" (476), together with " The–Golden–Supper" (49 has been noticed in Chapter II.

y poems in this new series that deal with difficult lems arising out of the relations between man and an. Formerly the poet pondered over disappointed due mostly to "marriage-hindering mainmon"; but he approaches subjects more delicate, more distressand more profound. Nor does he make known to us own opinions so clearly as of old; and this partly bee his method is more strictly dramatic. Or if we can whis moral with any confidence, we find it to be at ance with the lesson taught by some other poem that ts of a kindred subject, as when we compare "The t Quarrel" with "The Wreck." "I felt I had been lame" is Nell's conviction, and Tennyson's too, as we presume. It would not often be the conviction of modern novelist. And in "The Wreck" the woman has been false to a bad husband loses both lover and d.

part from any ethical purpose underlying these poems, y are dramatically effective, and true to the life; but every aspect of life is true to art.

n these later volumes Tennyson often employs a loping line of six accents with a variable number of ables clustering around each; and in most cases a ong pause marks the middle of the line. Also, the nber of lines in each stanza is seldom fixed. In this em they range from two to eightcen. This tendency vards freedom of movement as the poet nears the end his career, has been noticed in the preceding Chapter.

501) "RIZPAH." The date 17-, prefixed to this poem, ers the groundwork of the incident to the eighteenth ntury, when bodies of criminals were hanged in chains til they became skeletons. The name of the mother, as s noticed under "Claribel," is chosen by the poet for literary associations, which in this case are suggestive his subject. "Rizpah . . . from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven, suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them day, nor the beasts of the field by night. . . And t gathered the bones of them that were hanged." (Samuel xxi. 10 - 13.) So, too, as in "The Grandmoth the name of the son is Willie. The description of mother's devotion to her offspring in Robert Buchana Book of Orm" (1870), may also be mentioned in contion with "Rizpah."

The voice in the wind in the first stanza reminds us Gawain's "Hollow, hollow, hollow, all delight"; and "Follow, follow," or the "wind wailing for ever" in "Princess"; the "motherless bleat," in "The Childred Hospital"; the "music on the wind" in "The Mogueen"; the "wind of memory murmuring the past" "In Memoriam."

In this poem Tennyson makes ample amends for very feeble expression of a mother's love, as we read it "The Princess." Nothing, perhaps, could be weathan Lady Psyche's lamentation, "Ah me, my babe, blossom." . . . But here the strongest and the macered of instincts, made yet stronger and more sacred a situation of terrible pathos, is wrought into words a sung into immortal song as it never had been before.

(504) "THE NORTHERN COBBLER" is based up Mr. Robert Crompton's ballad in the Irish dialect, "Faci the Inimy" (1875). There we read how a cobbler

> "Hammered and stitched and hammered away, Whilst, labelled 'Potheen,' A bottle was seen On his small window-shelf."...

"That's the Inimy! Micky Muldoon would say . . . And I noticed the spirit from day to day

It never grew less, no, never!"

Though not so striking as a character sketch, th

n rivals in many other respects the two "Northern ners."

07) "THE REVENGE." For the incidents of this ndid ballad, Tennyson has relied mainly upon Sir ter Raleigh's report of the engagement, which was lished in the same year, 1591. Sir Richard Grenville well-known figure in Charles Kingsley's "Westward !" At the time of the Armada he was commissioned Elizabeth to protect Cornwall and Devon; and in 1591 sent out with a small squadron to intercept a Spanish sure fleet. The rest of his story is told in the poem. n movement, the ballad of "The Revenge" closely embles "The Battle of the Baltic," by Campbell; and as one or two recollections of Macaulay's "Armada." mpbell's ballad, however, is almost symmetrical, but myson allows himself so much license of construction, t in spite of some rhythmic sequences, the poem leaves the mind no distinct impression of form; and thus he es a more than Elizabethan freedom to his work. nerwise, in simplicity, force, swiftness, spirit-in all that pertains to the daring of the old English sea-dogs, the lad is magnificent.

'The Revenge" was first printed in "The Nineteenth ntury" for March, 1878. Some few years previously rald Massey had published a ballad of nineteen stanzas the same subject.

(509) "THE SISTERS." This idyllic monologue recalls me of the beauty and truth of "The Gardener's aughter," and other poems of the volume of 1842. Ich passages as "The aërial poplar wave, an amber ire"; "Down to the snowlike sparkle of a cloth On rn and foxglove . . passing jest"; "Born of the fool this Age that doubts of all "-these, and a hundred oth are excellent. But the story is painful and improbable; the words, "the love I bore them both," which are pivot of the poem, seem to ring false; and they alm spoil the splendid paragraph, "Now in this passage," The very objective view of nature in "We left her ha . . . to our joy," is characteristic of Tennyson, though spells the great mother's name with a capital. Twice repeats the Platonic doctrine already often hinted at in "The Passing of Arthur," in the paragraph near beginning, "I found Him in the shining of the stars for we hear that "a man's ideal Is high in Heaven, a lodged with Plato's God"; and that "this gross ha seeming world Is our misshaping vision of the Pow Behind the world." Here and there other poets le their aid; Wordsworth's ("Vaudracour and Julia"):

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Nec gemere aeria cessabit turtur ab ulmo"; with this should be conred "The moan of doves in immemorial elms."

"All Paradise
Could by the simple opening of a door
Let itself in upon him," may compare with "I stood upon the stairs of Paradis etc. In Wordsworth, also, is found the phrase "diviair" of the first song in this poem, and in the fifth star of the "Welcome to Alexandrovna." Also Wordswort "intellectual all-in-all," is like "his own imperial allall." "Home-return" is in Shakespeare. Many other resemblances will occur to the reader; these are me tioned as reminding him that the imitative tendency strong in Tennyson to the last; so also is the tendency repeat himself, though, considering the poet's advance age, that is not more marked than in his earlier year One example from many in this poem will be sufficien the second line of Evelyn's song, "Thro' the heat, t drowth, the dust, the glare," recalls the line of Edv Morris, "For in the dust and drowth of London life and the song itself is a beautiful variation upon the melc of "In Memoriam," Ixxxvi.

14) "THE VILLAGE WIFE: OR, THE ENTAIL." 1 re is dry humour but perhaps too much word-play is story told by "A hignorant village wife" of the ruin of 'owd Squire" who "niver knawed nowt but books."

17) "IN THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL." This pathetic y, said to be a true one, of the little child putting out arms on the counterpane, in order that Christ might we the sufferer who needed his love, appeared in Dedber, 1872, in a London local magazine called "St. brian's Banner." It was entitled "Alice's Christmas

y," and was related by a Sister of Mercy.

ennyson takes occasion to rebuke somewhat harshly very rare roughness of the hospital surgeon. He ins upon the need of kind words as "a medicine in mselves," of kindly looks as "a light of healing." "He adled him gently enough; but his voice and his face re not kind." But as a general fact, no men discharge ir terrible duties with greater patience and tenderness. so he repeats in almost stronger terms than of old his lignation expressed in "The Princess" against "Those enstrous males that carve the living hound And cram n with the fragments of the grave." More graciously, t with no less earnestness, he dwells on the power of rsonal religion: "How could I serve in the wards if the pe of the world were a lie?" adding, as for himself, Lord, how long?" and answering, "It will come by-and-." Beautifully he pleads for the presence of all things r and fragrant, flowers that "freshen and sweeten the ards like the waft of an angel's wing;" or the picture-Little children should come to me." To "the fool this ge that doubts of all" the last words here quoted from s noet may be as a stumbling block and a rock of offence. Say that his day is done! Ah, why should we care what they say?" But the question, What is the debt of humanities to religion, and of religion to theology, belong to a consideration of "The Promise of May."

<sup>1</sup> See p. 269, footnote.

(518) "DEDICATORY POEM TO THE PRINCESS ALI In December, 1878, "the fatal kiss Born of true life love" had touched the lips of the Queen's second daughthe Princess Alice; and to her sacred memory, in I equally sacred, the Poet Laureate dedicated the p that follows. The two poems were published together "The Nineteenth Century" for April, 1879.

(519) "THE DEFENCE OF LUCKNOW." In this bathe six-accent line we have met with so often among the later poems gives place here and there to one of seaccents, and with good effect, as in the first and last I of the first stanza. The last line of the stanza, though language is somewhat strained, serves as a long-drating triumphant refrain. We miss the simplicity and with the graphic strength of "The Revenge;" and tho "The Defence of Lucknow" is rapid to breathless yet it seems overweighted with detail, and fails a little the close. But we may be deeply thankful for such anon immortal song well mated with an immortal deed.

(521) "SIR JOHN OLDCASTLE, LORD COBHAM." I monologue gives a better dramatic account of itself the one in the first "Locksley Hall," although the first lines are obvious as a device, and the friend's coming referred to very often in the course of the long solilogue.

In the earlier volumes these studies of character we mostly mythical or of an older world: now the poet methan rivals the modern historian; and in this poem reminds us that he has become a student of history such purpose as was never attained before. "Haro had appeared four years earlier; and some four years er he gave to the world that historical masterwork, lecket." In his vivid, sympathetic, and favourable sketch Oldcastle, Tennyson was assisted by the "Ecclesiastical ography" of Dr. Christopher Wordsworth. According to Dr. Stubbs, the creed of the Lollard leader was ounder than the principles which guided either his oral or political conduct."

(525) "COLUMBUS." This is another sympathetic porit from history, but not a perfect one, nor is it always od poetry. Columbus in prison is visited by a friend om the Court, to whom he has much to tell concerning s experience of life. Columbus at this time was about ty-five years old, and he speaks, not with the garrulity of e, but with the long bitterness of disappointment and instice; nevertheless his words are often effusive, and the em is not very successful. Nor is the workmanship roughout so fine as usual. As in some of Tennyson's her monologues, a dramatic element is introduced by uplied remarks of the listener. The materials of this onologue are derived mostly from the Diary of Columis; but it also has many poetical resemblances to a poem Mr. Joseph Ellis, entitled, "Columbus at Seville." This pem was published by Pickering in 1869 and 1876 in volume entitled "Cæsar in Egypt, Costanza, and other oems." Although the work of Mr. Ellis is also based on ne Diary of Columbus, the parallel passages leave room or an opinion that the Laureate made use of it. In this onnection the "Vox Clamantis" of Mr. Eric Mackay, ublished by Stewart, may be read with some caution.

(529) "THE VOYAGE OF MAELDUNE." Dr. Joyce's Old Celtic Romances," published in 1879, were probably ne groundwork of this poem. They are a translation of the old Irish legend mentioned by the poet. He adapts at will to his own purpose—a second series of poetical magic-lantern slides, with a moral inscribed on the last Apart from the moral he seems to embody in his poen just a little of the popular notion that the Irishman mus e fighting.

Where imagery is abundant in Tennyson's poetry, we may expect to find resemblances to Shelley; and there are many in this poem. The following passage will serve as an example. In the description of the "underse isle" in v., "the water is clearer than air;" in Shelley is "the wave's intenser day;" both poets behold "palaces and "towers" in the garden of the deep; when the sufface of the water was troubled "the Paradise tremble away" in the one poet; in the other, the sea-blooms and the oozy woods "tremble and despoil themselves."

The same galloping six accents bear us swiftly throug these rare and beautiful scenes of fancy.

(532 and 533) "DE PROFUNDIS." It is strange that the poet who wrote "Tears, idle tears" as his way uttering St. Paul's "groanings which cannot be uttered, should also be the author of "De Profundis;" for whit the poetic quality of the earlier lyric is beyond all prais it is doubtful whether many of the lines now before us a poetry at all. Certainly "The Human Cry" is not; ar we will glance at that first. The poet surely has been groping about among the ashes of his youth:

"I feel there is something; but how and what?
I know there is somewhat, but what and why?
I cannot tell if that somewhat be I....
Why deep is not high, and high is not deep....
Why two and two make four; why round is not square...."
From "The 'How' and the 'Why," in the volume of 1830

Not "The Human Cry" alone, but the whole poem, is overstrained attempt to utter the unutterable:

"Of this divisible-indivisible world Among the numerable-innumerable, . . ."

se and the following five lines pass beyond the bounds art. Perhaps the best comment on such poetry is a otation that will throw it into relief by resemblance or trast, or both in one:

> "Searching an infinite Where, Probing a bottomless When, Dreamfully wandering, Ceaselessly pondering, What is the Wherefore of men: Bartering life for a There. Selling his soul for a Then. . . ."

d the rest of this little poem ("The Philosopher and the ilanthropist," written by J.K.S. when a boy at Eton) uld serve for the purpose.

The germ of "De Profundis" will be found in two lines "In Memoriam."

> "A soul shall draw from out the vast. And strike his being into bounds." (Epilogue, 34.)

Already in "The Two Voices" and "In Memoriam" genesis of the soul has been a matter of speculation, also its future destiny. The views embodied in this em are figured forth in "Crossing the Bar":

"When that which drew from out the boundless deep Turns again home," ich is Shelley's "That Power. . . . Which hath withawn his being to its own." Or, in the "Idylls of the ng:"

"From the great deep to the great deep he goes."

rain, in "The Higher Pantheism," "This weight of dy and limb Are they not sign and symbol of thy divin from Him?" or, in "The Ancient Sage,"

> "But that one ripple on the boundless deep Feels that the deep is boundless, and itself For ever changing form, but evermore One with the boundless motion of the deep."

But there is more than this in "De Profundis." Havin in section I. conducted the human soul from the shore of the great deep, through a personal existence in this worl to the shore of the great deep again, the poet in a secon Greeting proceeds to ponder over the great deep itsel and over those "abysmal deeps of personality," alread referred to in "In Memoriam," xlv. The spirit, a broke light from that one light, "drew to this shore" to learn b this fleshly sign, "that this is I" ("In Memoriam," xlv It "wailed being born," as in the Greek of Plotinus; will have to choose between the darker and the sunnie side of doubt; and at last, after passing through mar states of being, return to Him who wrought "this main miracle, that thou art thou." This part of the argument is important, for it presents one of the poet's views immortality. The poem closes with "The Human Cry which, however earnest, is too grotesque for commen and those who would be convinced of this, need only cor pare it with the opening stanzas of "In Memoriam."

In this brief survey no mention could be made of t many metaphysical points common also to "The Ancie

Sage."

(533) "PREFATORY SONNET TO THE NINETEENT CENTURY" (March, 1877). Tennyson's varying attitu towards doubt has received occasional consideration previous Chapters.<sup>2</sup> To the passages already quot from "In Memoriam" we will now add "He fought! doubts"; "Defects of doubt, and taints of blood"; "dot and death, Ill brethren"; "You tell me doubt is devil-be—I know not." Recently, in "The Sisters," we noticed line "Born of the fool this Age that doubts of all"; we have in this sonnet "Sunless gulfs of doubt"; in "Despai" Doubt is the lord of this dunghill"; lastly, in "Toward of the surprise of the surprise cient Sage," there are two sides to doubt, a sunnier and larker side; and in this we arrive at the usual Tennynian compromise. And we cannot too often call to our nds the importance of this judicial attitude of the poet wards the shifting thought of fifty years, of which this met is a striking epitome; and we do him honour for nturing on those sunless seas of doubt; and for planting e flag of poetry upon many a newly discovered land, hile other great literary artists of our time—Browning d Ruskin, for instance—lowered the value of their aching by basing it in greater part and to the very last, a the older systems of thought, Tennyson stood amongst scattering from one lavish hand choice dried fruits of e past, and with the other gathering for us the ripest of any tempting clusters of the present.

2 Pages 18, 81, 118.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Ennead." V. I. i; quoted by Mr. J. C. Collins.

The month in which this sonnet appeared is given in a cry picturesque phrase—"This roaring moon of daffodil nd crocus."

(533) "TO THE REV. W. H. BROOKFIELD." In 1875 is sonnet was prefixed to Lord Lyttleton's "Memoir of Villiam Henry Brookfield," one of Tennyson's old college iends. There is a touching reference to Arthur Hallam, The lost light of those dawn-golden times"; it speaks falove

"Abiding with me till I sail
To seek thee on the mystic deeps."

tiae, 'vap ἀνθρωπος (dream of a shadow—such is man,) is from indar, eighth Pythian, 136. The sentiment is often eversed, as in Shelley's "Shadow of some golden dream," r in "The Princess," "I myself, the shadow of a dream."

(533) "MONTENEGRO," (534) "TO VICTOR HUGO." These two sonnets were contributed to the "Nineteenth Century," the first in March, and the second in June, 1877. They are a valuable addition to the long list of poems in which Tennyson gives honour to gallantry or genius.

It is just worthy of notice that the one sonnet applauds the "smallest among peoples" for maintaining their nationality, while the other would bring in the day when all men will make one people.

- (534) "BATTLE OF BRUNANBURH." In the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," poetry takes the place of prose for the years 937, 942, 973, and 975. The first of these entries, a stirring ode on the Battle of Brunanburh, forms the groundwork of Tennyson's poem. With fine effect the poet adheres closely to the form of his original. But not to the form alone; for the prose rendering of Hallam Tennyson, "the raven with horny beak," becomes in his father's poem, "the horny-nibb'd raven"; and thus, with the aid of verse, the Laureate could retain the graphic nebban of the "Chronicle." It is a pleasure to have in modern English such a reproduction of the form and the spirit of this fine old song.
- (536) "ACHILLES OVER THE TRENCH," contributed to "The Nineteenth Century" for August, 1877. (See p. 280.)
- (537) "TO PRINCESS FREDERICA." On April 24th 1880, the Princess Frederica of Hanover was married to the Baron von Pawel Rammingen. Her father, who was afflicted with blindness, had been King of Hanover from 1851 till 1866.
- (537) "SIR J. FRANKLIN." Sir John Franklin was born at Spilsby, near Somersby, and was uncle of the poet's wife. These lines to his memory were written in 1877.
- (537) "To DANTE." These are among the best of Tennyson's shorter memorial verses. They owe much to the graceful art of the figure at the close.

CHAPTER XIII.

"TIRESIAS, AND OTHER POEMS."

1885 Tennyson published "Tiresias and Other Poems," volume of 204 pages as vigorous as its predecessor of 80. And in the next year, 1886, "Locksley Hall Sixty ars After" appeared with two other poems and "The omise of May," forming a volume of 201 pages. "The up" had been produced at the Lyceum in 1881, "The tomise of May" at the Globe Theatre in 1882; in 1884 [The Falcon" and "Becket" were published; and in 89 "Demeter, and Other Poems" followed "Locksley all Sixty Years After." Such a record of ten years' pour by a poet of more than threescore and ten is withta parallel; and by a strange coincidence, the productiveness of Robert Browning during the same ten years d at nearly the same period of life would rank next in over and quantity.

It is to Robert Browning that the "Tiresias" volume is edicated in the following terms: "To my good friend obert Browning, whose genius and geniality will best preciate what may be best and make most allowance in what may be worst, this volume is affectionately dicated."

An inscription in simpler language appears on the opening page of "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After"

"To my wife I dedicate this Dramatic Monologue ar the Poems which follow."

In the one-volume edition the group headed "Tiresia and Other Poems," really includes the contents of bothe volumes we have been describing, excepting th "Balin and Balan" is omitted from the "Tiresias" volum and "The Promise of May" from "Locksley Hall Six Years After." The other two poems in the latter volum "The Fleet," and "Opening of the Indian and Coloni Exhibition by the Queen," are placed near the end of the group.

(560) "LOCKSLEY HALL SIXTY YEARS AFTER."

As "Locksley Hall" was the most important amore the poems of Tennyson's early volumes, so "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" takes a high position, perhaps the highest, among the shorter poems of the later period it may therefore be considered first. With this exception the group will be reviewed in order as printed.

I. INTRODUCTORY.-It was noticed in the chapter of "Locksley Hall" that, adopting approximate dates, the hero of that poem would be about the same age as th poet say 30 years. When some fifty years had passed Tennyson published his "Locksley Hall Sixty Year After;" by that time he was three years short of eight and eighty is the age assigned to the hero on this h second appearance. This, then, is the first point t notice; the poet may be supposed in each case to h about as old as his hero. As to the "Sixty Years After. they are put roughly. Supposing the first "Locksle Hall" to have been written a few years before 1842, an this poem not long before 1886, a period of something les than fifty years lies between. But the sixty years ar conventional; nor need they apply rigidly to the poems but generally to the subject matter. Yet, knowing as w ur poet's carefulness in regard to dating as far back ossible, we may leave the question open.

nis poem was probably rough-cast, if not finished, e time before 1886; certainly, two of its couplets first of all inserted in the "Locksley Hall" of 1842, 7 and 8 of the new poem between 19 and 20 of the er one. It is further interesting to notice that "The Voices Sixty Years After," in other words, "The ent Sage," was published in the "Tiresias" volume of year before (1885); and we remember that "Locksley " and "The Two Voices" appeared together in 1842. third parallel between the first and the second cksley Hall," will be found in their environment. has already been suggested on p. 159. The poems e referred to as being near to the second "Locksley " in subject and in date would be such as some of the "Idvlls of the King," together with passages recently ed to the earlier ones; also "Despair" (1881); "The mise of May" (1882); the "Epilogue to The Charge e Heavy Brigade (1882); "Freedom" (1884); "Vast-"(1885); and the two other occasional pieces pubed in the "Locksley Hall" volume of 1885; also, and t important, and of later date, many of the poems in "Tiresias" volume of 1886, and the "Demeter" me of 1889. Such are the songs, some grave, some ous, some almost despondent, notes from which may e heard in the stormy music of "Locksley Hall Sixty rs After."

. ITS PERSONAL CHARACTER.—Possibly enough was in the chapter on the companion poem to establish poet's relationship to the speaker of this later monoe. And in the notes on the "Supposed Confessions Second-rate Sensitive Mind," which is the first in this es of self-examining and self-revealing soliloquies, some anation was given of the way in which Tennyson ears to have availed himself of this mode of utterance.

And the series is a long one; in poems beginning withe "Supposed Confessions" of 1830, and ending wi "Akbar's Dream," of 1889, the Laureate occasional revealed his view of contemporary life -but at the san time concealed something—by dressing himself up, moor less exactly, as one of his leading characters.

EVIL.—We have again to notice that the poet general makes out as good a case as possible against himself. I does full justice to the darker side of doubt before turnit towards us the narrowest crescent of the sunnier side. I dwells long on the subject of evil before a hint of redeeing good is offered. Though not quite so valiant, perhaj yet, like Browning, he is "ever a fighter," and he seer inclined, if we may take a hint from his "Northee Cobbler," to make the most of his enemy. But, as a have remarked elsewhere, Tennyson is too cautious to sanguine; he is disposed to take life seriously rather the confidently; Browning will believe where Tennyson only trust.

Light is struck from hardest stone; and the blacker t darkness, the brighter is that light. In part, at lea this is Tennyson's way; and he is not alone in the When the curtain falls on the last scene of "King Lea our hearts are full—not of the tragedy, but of the loveline of goodness that the tragedy made possible. The work we whisper, that owns Cordelia, must be owned by Go In "The Two Voices" "the arguments," to repeat Tenn son's opinion of "In Memoriam," "are about as good one side as the other;" but the poem concludes wisomething more powerful than argument; it is a picture

"These three made unity so sweet. . . . I blest them"- even as we bless Cordelia.

The hostile forces in "The Princess" falter on bo sides before the presence of a little child; the problem In Memoriam " find their fittest solution in the mere of a marriage; the holy love between the man and man in "Despair" proved that for them despair was eality impossible; the two men and two women found bful in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" proclaim is that the protest was pitched too high; that the aged stard " might sately have lowered the note of his simism—though certainly that would have sport some the sounding couplets; and we further wonder why, a four such examples of goodness within his experience, had not thought of reforming himself—and, next to a, of reforming others. Nor will the hero of "Locksley II a Thousand Years After" be a consistent pessimist we has lived to respect one man or one woman—uding himself.

V. COMPARED WITH "LOCKSLEY HALL," (a) As nologues: "Locksley Hall" was a soliloquy; "Locksley Il Sixty Years After" has the advantage of being ner more dramatic, for the one speaker addresses ther person whose remarks he repeats in a fragntary and ejaculatory manner; for example the lifth sixth couplets expanded might read "cirandson: y curse on the old dotard; as though he had any love give her; but she jilted me for him just because he had of money? Grandfather: 'Why should you curse ? pity him, rather; he has put a halter round his k; and as to dotard, an old man might easily be led by such a woman, but surely you ought to have more sense. However, I suppose you loved her well ugh, and you might have made her happy but no, possible; and we shall see whether the fortune she has rried is going to bring her any happiness." This ni dramatic device is employed by Tennyson in many er poems, such as; "The Northern Cobbler," Northern

I Couplets 24, 25, 29, 32, 120, 134.

Farmer," "Despair," "Happy," "Rizpah," "The Quarrel," "The Village Wife," "Columbus," "Rom Remorse," "Charity." He must have felt the awkwar of some of the situations in "Locksley Hall"; as no already, the idea of a soldier waiting until his "1 comrades" call him, is not exactly a good one. John Oldcastle" is an improvement in this respect speaker in that poem is waiting for a friend who appointed to meet him. On the other hand, a fuller of drama, as in "Walking to the Mail," involve greater difficulties; therefore Tennyson often pref the middle course, which was more graphic than a soliloguy or a story told to no one, and yet avoided troublesome dramatic elements of characters and inci

(b) Their Subject. As to the subject of these po everything has gone wrong, first in the ardent ey youth and early manhood, next in the dimmer ey fourscore years.1 Ultimately, as explained in Chapte these views of the world, with more or less of exact represent respectively those of Tennyson when he the age of about thirty and eighty.

To realize the two characters of the one individua to discriminate between them is not such an easy ta might be imagined. The hero of the earlier poem denly sees everything with a "jaundiced eye;" the v is the same world, but he has been unfortunate in a affair, and forthwith that world is to him-he uses words of Hamlet-"out of joint." The Prince Princess Ida that if she withheld her love she "n shock him even to death Or baser courses, children despair." This lover crossed in love does not seek re in death from broken heart, nor in suicide, nor ric living; his disease takes a form more agreeable to poet's purpose. After some years he recovers confide ially, if not entirely, and begins again to look forward.1 he later poem the same character appears at the of eighty; once more the time is out of joint; but ? If we admit that his conduct in the first poem was some extent habitual, and not determined by one len and overwhelming cause; and if we further admit his disappointment expressed itself strangely and exagantly; or if, not content with this, we have recourse he later poem for a somewhat enlarged portrait of the ent young lover, Sone the fires of youth, the follies, furies, curses, passionate tears. . . .

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Aged eyes may take," etc., is the "moral" of the poem.

es that shook me once, but now to silent ashes fall'n away," n how can we understand the aged hero when he cones himself "heated," 2 or again, when he tells us that curses of his youth are gone, and yet a little later on he poem,3 and when almost breathless with cursing, pros that he must curse his fill, being old. Other difficulties end any careful study of these two characters; but vill be best to admit conventionally that the young n of "Locksley Hall" would be intolerant in old age, I more than other old men accustomed to abuse the sent and to look back with fondness to the past; only have to repeat that this motive for the poem is in lity cancelled by the lines quoted above. Yet more, in uplets 24 and 26, we are told that Edith healed him his disease, and that with her for forty years his life golden sequence ran."

From this glance at the characters, we may turn for a ment to the leading topics of the two poems. Some of ese were indicated in Chapter V.; others are best idied in connection with the contemporary poems asned to them severally in that and the present Chapter. or example, the germ in "Locksley Hall," "Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers," was found fully developed "In Memoriam"; immortality and many kindred s jects in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," are am and wisely discussed in the "Ancient Sage." Oth such as Science, Art, Evolution, Social Evils, War, Tuture, have already been touched upon in these pag for it is scarcely possible to review the writings of Ten son without frequent reference to those storehouses of favourite themes, the two "Locksley Halls." It remate to be noticed that some of the topics included in "Locks Hall Sixty Years After" seem to have been worked in the couplets several years earlier than the date of publition, 1886.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Couplet 76. <sup>3</sup> Couplets 76 and 77.

(c) Their Style. Under this head a strange phenomer presents itself, which, however, is fully explained in Appendix to Chapter XI. In point of style the two poe are exactly reversed; the angry and impetuous uttera of "youthful jealousy" is restrained by an almost varied evenness of rhythm, whereas the reflections of "old white-headed dreamer" 2 rush along in lines tumultuous as a torrent. There are passages in the ear poem where the even flow of the river of verse is brol by boulders 3 or quickened to a rapid; 4 and in the torr stream of the later poem are placid coves 5 where moon and "Venus near her" smile reflected in unuttera beauty; but the main characteristics of the two wo are strikingly different, and are exactly the opposite what we should have expected. To descend to particula half a trochaic line in "Locksley Hall" is now and th changed to iambic; but except for an extra syllable two this is almost the only important variation admitted whereas in the later poem the trochaic measure is div

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Locksley Hall," couplet 120.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," couplet 19.

<sup>3</sup> Couplets 48, 49, 4 Couplets 91, 9

<sup>6</sup> Couplets 16-18, 85, 89-96, 105, 106, 129, 130, 137-140.

d by numberless devices; only one can be mentioned by numberless devices; only one can be mentioned by which especially makes the metre more turbulent, the introduction of many extra syllables; unless we not to the rhyme "Zolaism" which borders on the ble. The length of the poems deserves attention; 141 couplets of "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" against 97 of "Locksley Hall" may suggest the rulity of age; and the breaks indicated by asterisks and wavering in the course of thought, due the same cause. Otherwise they are not easily active the same cause.

a somewhat similar phenomenon appears when the mishes of the two poems are considered; the faults of first poem are due to excess of weakness, and of the ond to excess of strength. In "Locksley Hall" there is that might almost be called effusive, thin, effeminate; not seldom we seem aware that the poetry is careful chwork and not careless passion. On the contrary pocksley Hall Sixty Years After" is often Byronic in its mess and force. In every way it is a much more verful poem than its predecessor.

But lastly, we apply ourselves to the pleasant duty of nting out some of the literary merits of these wonderpoems; and perhaps it may not be impertinent to ise even "Locksley Hall" as now we view it by the cof its companion of more recent years. We notice the absolute fitness of its charm—the charm of youth; enchantment over us is "the fulness of the spring;" hear the copses ringing; our being becomes renewed all objects of new life and loveliness; and the distance the future melts away into the hues of hope.

n the maturer poem there is nothing so buoyant, and th, and young; yet it holds us enchanted with a spell strong. "Locksley Hall" sent a joyous thrill through blood; but there are passages in "Locksley Hall Sixty ars After" that make the heart ache with their beauty.

(538) TIRESIAS. "Tiresias" is less modern in tr ment than Tennyson's other classical poems, and on account partly it is less interesting; also, the workn ship is below the level of "Ulysses," "Tithonus," "Lu tius;" yet it contains noble passages, with a mod touch here and there. In the lines "To E. Fitzger (537) it is referred to as "dating many a year ago."

"Tiresias" is suggested by the "Phænissæ" of Eurip and the "Septem contra Thebas" of Æschylus. Theban "prophet old" addresses himself to Menœc gives him one of the varying accounts of his blindness, prophesies that if Menœceus will slay himself, Th will be victorious over the Argives. The best thing ir poem is the description of Pallas "climbing from bath;" the nine closing lines, also magnificent, are ada from Pindar.

The prefatory lines "To E. Fitzgerald" are a poetour de force; they run on without a break to the c "Your Omar" which "drew Full-handed plaudits the best," is Fitzgerald's "Translation of the Rubaiy Omar Khayyam," 1858.

"Tiresias," which the poet's son Hallam found some forgotten book of mine," was sent to Fitzgera 1883, but too late to receive a criticism that might "red A less diffuse and opulent end." In the pathetic "logue," which, though shorter, yet being sadder, has or two breaks, we meet with another of Tennyson's manufacture.

"If night, what barren toil to be!"

(541) "THE WRECK." This is one of the many blems of marriage pondered over by Tennyson. emotional girl who loves her Shelley, has been "gir to a man of the world—a man in stature, a dwarf in i lect, who loves his Tables of Trade and Finance; heartless; chills her efforts to please him, and greets thorn with the exclamation, "Pity it isn't a boy." She was her husband and her baby girl; spends "ten long ys of summer and sin" with a man who is a dwarf in ture but a giant in intellect; then a storm brings to the cry of her child; the man falls dead at her feet. e is saved from the wreck to learn that her little one 1 "gone" after "Ten long sweet summer days' of fever, I want of care!"

The moral is obvious. Marriage is an institution so eful as to be deemed necessary; but no law is so just as to be unjust to an individual here and there; and we must sacrifice the law for the sake of the individual. It definitions plea for divorce been successful, society ald have perished.

544) "DESPAIR." The leading thought of this poem expressed in the following line of Division V.: "We I past from a cheerless night to the glare of a drearier y." In these words the poet compares the effect proced on average human life by the "fatalist creed" on a one hand, and by "the Age" (with its capital letter) the other. The "cramping creeds," we are told, had ddened the people, and must vanish, together with the I they had invented; and, as we are also told, the ew dark ages" with their "know-nothing books" had razed their victim. . . . "O yes" . . . This imtant fact has sometimes been overlooked; the poet nounces, with equal sternness, both the creed that ddens and the Age that crazes.

And what are we to learn from this? Is there any be? We seem to learn at least one lesson; it is not we to these pages—"There's nothing we can call our no but love." Love runs its course through the poem as a streamlet through a dark valley, revealing itself to in silver glimpses here and there, till it passes from our the towards the sea—the sea to which these two gave up their love. "Fear? Am I not with you?"..."Ashe laid her hand in my own"... "And we turned each other"... "Dear love"... "She is gone! castay?"... "Never a kiss so sad."... There we not pause; what a mistake they made, this loving pair; we unequivocal logic is love's: "Never a kiss so sac surely, surely, the kiss should have been their happi sealing the bliss of the past—pledge of the peace to theirs at once—and for ever! "There's nothing we call our own but love." They just forgot that, and kiss was sad.

With Lear and Cordelia it was exactly the oppos when both had "incurred the worst," the words of the king to Cordelia were such as these,

"Come, let's away to prison:
We two alone will sing like birds i' the cage. . . .
And we'll wear out
In a wall'd prison, packs and sects of great ones
That ebb and flow by the moon. . . ."

Why? merely because Lear had come to learn with the husband and wife in "Despair" manifested, yet for realize,

"There's nothing we can call our own but love."

Nor did the author of "Despair" realize this very obve moral of his poem, for in the prefatory note alread ferred to he assures us that the pair were "utterly mable."

If we now ask, what does Tennyson wish us to us stand from this poem, we first answer, "Despair followed immediately by "The Ancient Sage"; they be regarded as separate portions of an improved "Voices;" and it is to "The Ancient Sage" that we appeal for the poet's explanation of this tragedy. before passing on to this long commentary on "Designation of the poet's explanation of the poet's explanation of this tragedy.

may apply to the latter poem a statement by Tennyson eady referred to: "All the arguments are about as good one side as the other, and thus throw man back more the primitive impulses and feelings." Now these two les, according to the poet, have two distinct names; e in this poem "the darker side" of doubt; the other the next poem, "the sunnier side of doubt." "Thrown ck on the primitive impulses and feelings," we seldom l to recognize these two sides, and we naturally choose e sunnier,1 "the larger hope"; bred up by "their knowthing books," we may even then exclaim "Ah! yet-I ve had some glimmer, at times, Of a God behind all, e great God, for aught that I know"; but we shall turally "lean to the darker side." This is the second oral to be drawn from "Despair." Yet a third aspect the poem also forms a fitting introduction to "The cient Sage." The poet, as we have seen, equally conmns the "know-all chapel," and "the know-nothing oks," the dogmatic assertion of the "creed,"2 and the gmatic negation of the agnostic.3

(547) "THE ANCIENT SAGE." An alternative title for s poem, as suggested in a former chapter, was "The vo Voices Sixty Years After"; but, prompted by the st sentence in our review of "Despair," and mindful also "The Higher Pantheism," we will now propose to style "The Higher Agnosticism." From this point of view e shall be enabled to deal briefly with a poem that might nerwise make an excessive demand upon our space.

So long as agnosticism contents itself with a rejection the "know-all" doctrine ("Despair," xvi), it is comparately har.nless; but when in its turn it grows positive, d draws up its creeds—"I do not believe more than I a see"; "The mind is limited to a knowledge of phenomena"; "I never believe in anything unless I have an absolutely scientific ground for believing in it"—when it formulates such creeds as these, it deserves the poet's stern rebuke in "Despair." Take the last of them; it admits of ready refutation; no absolutely scientific ground has yet been discovered for believing in anything; all physical questions are speedily lost in metaphysical issues. "The most unreasonable of men," said a great thinker, "are those who will have a reason for everything." This lower agnosticism is of more recent date; but the higher agnosticism has been professed by great souls from Socrates downwards. In "The Ancient Sage" it is admirably expressed in the following words:

&lt;sup>1</sup> Few find in the fact of choice a necessity for pessimism.

<sup>2</sup> Division iv.

<sup>3</sup> Division xvi.

"For nothing worthy proving can be proven, Nor yet disproven; wherefore be thou wise, Cleave ever to the sunnier side of doubt."

This doctrine points to a middle course; it does no limit human knowledge to phenomena; it respects "the primitive impulses and feelings"; those intuitions tha lie deeper than knowledge and transcend phenomena; by which, when experience fails, we believe in "that which is" with greater assurance than experience itself could warrant.

Further than this we cannot go; and at least the fact that the lower negations themselves rest on mere assump tion, leaves us a heart to learn the other great lesson of the poem,

"Let be thy wail, and help thy fellow men."

This corresponds exactly to the first moral we drew from "Despair"—

"There's nothing we can call our own but love;"

and this, again, was the conclusion of "The Two Voices." From the higher position whence this bird's-eye view of the Ancient Sage" was obtained, we must now descend more particular but brief examination of its doctrines. have in this poem a summary of the Poet's opinions the many mysteries of our being; and the Sage may id, in the first instance, for Tennyson himself. He es forth from his ancient city accompanied by a young a, "Worn from wasteful living," whose notions of life contained in the text, "Let us eat and drink, for torrow we die."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In Memoriam," xcv. (10).
<sup>2</sup> See p. 147.

ome of these notions the young man has written down erse; he has the scroll with him; and as they proceed their way, the Ancient Sage reads his young friend's ming lines, but pauses at intervals to add blank verse aments of his own.

he first few lines of the lyric imply that only the world re see it is ours; there is nothing beneath or beyond earances. "The likest god," the Sage answers, "is in you." Then, quoting the modern philosopher who defined the limits of knowledge, he adds:

"When thou sendest thy free soul thro' heaven,

Thou seest the Nameless of the hundred names."

But the Nameless never came among us; he cannot proved."

Nothing, O my son, can be proved, and nothing disred; therefore art thou free to believe; by faith alone at thou embrace the Power who brings good out of

What Power? An intelligence like our own? or blind

His work is not yet finished; we are parts, and cannot the whole."

There is no power but Time; and Time destroys all."
Our thin minds break into Thens and Whens an eterNow."

"One common end o'ertakes life's idle dreaming— Dust, darkness, tears."

"The doors of night may be the gates of Light."

"We are but as a ripple on the boundless deep."

"My son, that ripple is boundless, because the deep boundless. In spirit I have seemed to traverse an eternpast; in a trance I am flashed at times through an eternfuture."

"But why is this life so evil and so sad?"

"Good and evil, like Time, are relative terms that lost their meaning in the eternal act of creation; they will lost their meaning to us even here, if we do our best."

As was stated in the remarks on "The Two Voices," w do not expect to find a system of philosophy in a sho poem; nor can any attempt be made in a book like th present to test the soundness of the poet's doctrines. will be enough to notice that they are mostly "new-old and are gathered from many writers. Some of the speclations of this poem and "The Two Voices," date back the days of Plato; the teaching of "The Ancient Sage is referred by Tennyson to "A thousand summers e the time of Christ," But probably some two hundre years before Plato is all the poet meant. In the age, a contemporary of "Eastern Confutzee" live another Chinese philosopher, Lau-Tsze, whose work translated by John Chambers, seem to have furnished Tennyson with material for such passages as the or beginning, "The Abysm of all Abysms," which aga suggests the 106th couplet of "Locksley Hall Sixty Yea After." It may further be noticed that the many write from Lau-Tsze to Wordsworth, who suggest theories the later poet, also supply him now and then with h

Lastly, much of "The Ancient Sage" is found

<sup>1</sup> Mentioned in 1st edition of "The Palace of Art."

anyson's earlier work; the relativity of time in the stage, "The days and hours . . . serve thy will," is pressed as fully and clearly in "The Princess." he Passion of the Past" has already been referred as also the description of trance, "And more, son . . ."—read best of all in "In Memoriam" xcv.; In not unknown to other writers, Wordsworth, Plotinus, Thomas Browne, John Addington Symonds. The cory of polarity, "No night no day!" "No ill no cod!" presents itself frequently in Tennyson from first last.

Furning now from the thought of the poem to its form, must admire one of the finest metrical contrasts literature; and we immediately recollect "The ook." Here the rhyming tetrameters and trimeters ggest the careless levity of unbelief, and where they eak for a moment the calm faith of the blank verse, they mind us of those mountain torrents that foam into the ty until the mighty river widens to the ocean, and they a heard no more.

(552) "THE FLIGHT." This is in some respects a mpanion poem to the "The Wreck." The problem ere left to be solved by suffering in obedience to law here anticipated, and calls for no solution. The ide of "The Flight" does not stay to be "given." In the early morning of the day fixed for her marriage th a man she loathes, she flies with her sister to seek me distant shore where haply she may meet with her loved Edwin. It is much weaker work than "The treck"; the story drags; its May Queen stanza (more paraularly of the "Conclusion") suits it somewhat ill, having the old drawbacks with but little of the old charm.

<sup>1 111, 306-313.</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Pp. 62, 63, 103, etc.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chapter VII., Appendix.

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;The Wreck," II, I.

- (555) "To-MORROW." See pp. 268 and 269; and especially the note on the Irish dialect, p. 268.
- (557) "THE SPINSTER'S SWEET-ARTS." Although the present writer is more familiar with the dialects of the north of England than with the Irish brogue of the former poem, he has placed them on the same literary footing Still, no commentator can omit to recognize in "The Spinster's Sweet-arts" a study both clever and amusing.
- (568) "PROLOGUE TO GENERAL HAMLEY." In 1873 General Hamley, a friend of the poet, had contributed to Blackwood a very clever parody of Tennyson in his "Sin Tray; an Arthurian Legend." These prefatory lines open with an excellent bit of painting from nature.
- (568) "THE CHARGE OF THE HEAVY BRIGADE AT BALACLAVA" ("Macmillan's Magazine," 1881), is another "song that nerves a nation's heart;" and though, like the other, not free from flaws, is a fine companion poem to the "Charge of the Light Brigade." "Like drops of blood in a dark-gray sea" is a daring simile.
- (569) "EPILOGUE." "Irene" (Greek for "peace") may stand for those—and there would be many of them—who expressed to the poet their entire disapproval of war. The sentiment of the poem has been noticed elsewhere, especially the theory of the source of evil—"Perchance from some abuse of Will In worlds before the man."
- (570) "To Virgil." Though written at request for the nineteenth centenary of Virgil's death, this is a beautiful poem, and hardly less inspired than the lines to Catullus. Truly a great poet can criticise a great poet. "Thou majestic in thy sadness at the doubtful doom of human kind": all who have loved Virgil will marvel at and love that line; it is exactly what they must have felt, felt a yearning to express. Nor would they be greatly ned to dispute the epithet "stateliest" as applied to metre of the poet.

- y a poem of early years? It seems too vigorous for date before 1830, though the thought occurs early ugh. Stanza IX. has something in common with "The "; v. and vI. are graphic. But the poem is unworthy Tennyson. It might be advisable to protest with ity once or twice against hostile or vicious criticism; there were probably times when indifference on the of the Laureate would have been more effective than protest. On this occasion he may almost seem to ddressing the critics who had recently condemned his omise of May."
- 73) "EARLY SPRING." What a transition! An angel ght stands singing where but a moment before a on of darkness lay howling. It may be a fancy, but the than once we seem to trace a purpose in the sequence opens. Further criticism of "Early Spring" is not led; we could not praise the poem more highly; to see it less would be unjust.
- 73) "PREFATORY POEM TO MY BROTHER'S SON-S." This was the latest record of a brother's love, which of familiar to all who read "In Memoriam," lxxix. cii. Charles Tennyson-Turner died at Cheltenham, l 25th, 1879. In 1835 he assumed the name of his e, the Rev. S. Turner, vicar of Grasby, to whose living acceeded. He was well known as a writer of sonnets, he of which he tells us "The seal of Truth is Beauty."
- 74) "FRATER AVE ATQUE VALE" ("The Ninetcenth

Early Spring" was published in "The Youth's Companion," 1884.

Century," March, 1883). Sirmio, now Sirmione, is a prinsula ("all but island") on the shores of Lake Bena (now Garda). This was a favourite spot with the p Catullus, as he tells us in his poems. The words "Fra Ave atque Vale" are found at the end of the pathe lament of Catullus for his brother. Nothing but tender regret of a great poet could have made low poetry of nine lines all rhyming together.

(574) "HELEN'S TOWER." Privately printed by Lo Dufferin. The pamphlet containing "Helen's Towe bears an engraving of the tower on the title page; with are two poems, both unsigned. The first is, "To my do son, on his 21st birthday, with a Silver Lamp," and it from the pen of Lady Dufferin; the second is Tennyson On the last page are the words, "On Wednesday, October 23rd, 1861, Helen's Tower was finished."

"Browning's 'Sonnet to my Mother,' following the tipage, he sent me as a dedication to Helen's Tower, which Tennyson also composed a poetical inscription This tower I built on a hill at Clandeboye, overlookin lovely view of the sea, in order to contain the verses who my mother wrote to me the day that I came of ag (From a Memoir by her son, the Marquis of Dufferin a Ava, prefixed to a volume of Poems by Helen, La Dufferin. John Murray, 1894).

(574 and 575) "EPITAPHS." Tennyson's poetical was so extensive and so various, that it must sometimes to maintain its author's average reputation. His epital are not very successful. They are mostly epigramma in form, and may have been suggested by some of epigrams of Simonides. The familiar phrase "Light Light" is employed as finely as the kindred phrase Keats, "Light in light" ("In Memoriam," xci. "Happy," x.)

(75) "TO THE DUKE OF ARGYLL." "Ever-changcircumstance" has already been referred to on pages and 95. In these eleven lines of blank verse we may notice Tennyson's deference to "never-changing W.22

575) "HANDS ALL ROUND." (See also p. 263). This g was sung at St. James's Hall by Mr. Santley in rch, 1882, to music by Mrs. Tennyson. It is very rited, being one of the best of the patriotic songs. In I, at the suggestion of Sir F. Young, the "Examiner" by of 1852 was altered so as to include the Colonies. many lines we are reminded of Tennyson's love of npromise:

> "That man's the best Cosmopolite Who loves his native country best."

575) "FREEDOM," (" Macmillan's Magazine," Decemr, 1884). The goal of ethical progress is personal and cial freedom. Something like this may be discovered Tennyson's excellent poem.

(576) "H.R.H. PRINCESS BEATRICE." These lines ere printed in "The Times," July 23rd, 1885. On that y H.R.H. Princess Beatrice was married to Prince enry of Battenberg, who, however, continued to live with e Queen.

The blank verse of this poem is scarcely so good as ual; and but for the three lines at the close, some of e imagery might border on the fanciful.

(577) "THE FLEET." Printed in "The Times," April rd, 1885, under the heading "The Fleet. (On its Reorted Insufficiency)." These stanzas may have been iggested by the Debate on the Navy Estimates, April oth. They are a fitting introduction to the poem that llows. The poet gives expression to an opinion that passes ever and again over the minds of Englishmen li "a great third wave"—"The fleet of England is her a in-all."

(577) "OPENING OF THE INDIAN AND COLONIA EXHIBITION." Though not so good as the former E hibition Ode, this was very appropriate to the new occ sion. In the third stanza it contains a graphic description of the founding of the United States. The Colonial Exhibition was opened May 4th, 1886.

This poem was written at the request of the Prince of Wales; and the impressive companion lines in the Epilogue to the "Idylls of the King" are said to have been suggested by Lady Franklin. These two poems form a striking additional proof of the intense interest taken by the poet in our "ever-broadening England."

(578) "POETS AND THEIR BIBLIOGRAPHIES." Again we have "laudator temporis acti." This unthankful them has been glanced at more than once in these pages Nor is the sonnet a very good one: the line

"You see your Art still shrined in human shelves" is one of the worst Tennyson ever published.

It will be observed that the poets selected are Latin. And here it will be interesting to notice that partly owing to circumstances, and partly to inclination, Tennyson has cast a flower of poetry at the feet of three Latin poets, and not one Greek. For his "Lucretius," though unavowed, is a splendid tribute to that poet. Certainly Homer occupies an honoured place in "The Princess" and "The Palace of Art" and the "Epilogue to the Charge of the Heavy Brigade." But with this exception, no Greek poet is specially mentioned by Tennyson.\(^1\) Like himself, the n poets were mostly imitative and artistic, and he have felt that he was more akin to them.

 $<sup>^{1}</sup>$  The poem "  $\rm To~Virgil$  " contains an incidental reference to Hesiod—"he that sang the Works and Days,"

orace, whom he resembles in manner only, and that isionally, he here styles "popular;" that is the best could say of a poet possessing—or owning to—little ng, and a low order of imagination. Catullus wears wreath of sweeter bay"; love with Horace was fashion, a Catullus, passion.

(78) "To W. C. Macready." In February, 1851, at rewell banquet to the famous actor, W. C. Macready, sonnet was read to the guests by John Forster. It been written for the occasion by Tennyson, and was ated in "The Household Narrative of Current Events," other periodicals. "Full-handed thunders" is a liation of "full-handed plaudits" in the lines "To E. aggerald." The poet's opinions of modern drama are reresting; the lines "Nor flicker down to brainless atomime, And those gilt gauds men-children swarm to "a re a picturesque description of a modern perverted te. The tribute to Shakespeare recalls a phrase in he Palace of Art,"-" Shakespeare bland and mild."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE DRAMAS.

I. INTRODUCTORY. We are constantly told that dramatic literature is intended primarily for stage representation. But this statement will be subject to modification according to the varying conditions imposed by the progress of time. When a play by Shakespeare can be bought for a penny, and a novel for threepence, the dramatist may perhaps be pardoned if he gives a second thought to the readers.

This, however, is certain; the playwright should in every instance adapt his work to the actor; he should at least write under the impression that his play will be represented as actual life upon the boards of a theatre; he cannot lose by preparing it for this final and supreme test of dramatic worth. Doubtless his capacity for creating an infinite variety of dramatic activities directed towards an issue clear to himself from the first, and always complete at the last, and his faculty of giving them expression in language that will appeal with equal power to boxes and gallery, will be tried to the uttermost; but unless he submits on every occasion to this sternest and loftiest artistic training, he will not succeed.

When, therefore, we read in Tennyson's own words that his "Becket" was "not intended in its present form eet the exigencies of our modern theatre," we read its doom.

me measure of success may attend the piece when nged for the stage by Sir. H. Irving, and interpreted by elf and a powerful company, aided by all the modern ic accessories; and the words of the author shall not ccepted too literally; we will regard them rather as nabitual "prelude of disparagement;" and further, we admit that in writing "Becket" he kept the theatre e carefully in view than before. But in order to underd the significance that still underlies his admission, have only to refer to the one fortunate artist who proed drama at once popular, of the highest poetic merit, of lofty purport. When Shakespeare wrote a play, at, as it were, on the stage, with his audience before . He knew the tread of the stage; he heard his y sentence declaimed; saw every movement, every ure interpreted by the actor even as he was writing; watched the faces of the gallants above or around , and of the groundlings below. Such a statement as nyson's would have been absolutely impossible with kespeare; we seem to hear him exclaim with astonishnt, "If I did not write every word of this for the stage, at did I write it for? Certainly not to be read; who is ng to read it?-when, where, how, why?"

nother useful hint is supplied by "The Promise of y." The author did not see why 2 "the great moral social questions of the time ought not to be touched in in a modern play." There was no reason why they uld not; but all that could be heard of "The Promise May" before it appeared was to one and the same ct—it would deal with Agnosticism. Therefore it is

Cf. also the note at end of Act II. in "The Foresters," where the poet to stage copy transfers, his Fairy Scene to the end of Act III. "for the of modern dramatic effect."

Letter to Mr. Hall Caine.

presumable that a dominating purpose, moral and no artistic, was present with Tennyson when he wrote. Suc a writer would scarcely keep his moral sufficiently under control. Again we refer to Shakespeare. His first bus ness was to write a good and a successful play; if som one had worked at the subject before, so much the better his re-cast would be all the more popular. Every on knew something about Julius Cæsar and Brutus; they ha already been dramatized, and were excellent material i every way. He liked the characters certainly; but h must let them evolve themselves as the drama migh determine, and not that they might please himself. H would set them in motion towards a catastrophe, and the would proceed of themselves, so to speak. Everything else, notions of imperial authority, of republican indepen dence, the fickleness of the mob, would be incidental to the main purpose, a good and paying play.

This mention of Julius Casar leads up to a third shor note. In Shakespeare's day history, even English history was story. Tennyson might have done better with mor romantic materials—and he did try them later, but hi efforts are best regarded as experiments. Like Shake speare, he wisely adopted history for dramatic practice but Shakespeare's best plays are not historical—no English history. Tennyson began too late. Age over took him before he could get through his dramatic apprenticeship

It is often argued that because Tennyson and Browning wrote many monodramas, they either had not the faculty of writing drama, or they destroyed it. This is partly true; yet Shakespeare at the outset wrote his monodramas—plays with one, or at the most, two characters, like "Richard II.," "King John," "Richard III.," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and others. He also began with some less dramatic work, "Venus and Adonis," and "Lucrece"; and in a tentative way pieced out dramas we know little about. But he was fortunate enough et to work on complex drama very early in his career, to write more of it than any other man.

close connection with this habit of drawing one acter with one environment, as opposed to the tion of characters through the medium of the infinite ions of life, we may note the tendency towards a subve treatment manifested by most modern dramatists. on wrote autobiographies rather than dramas; and in y plays of Browning, Swinburne, and Tennyson the t of the author peers at times through the mask of his acters, or flits among them like an unquiet ghost. disadvantage, however, is not always present, nor ys disastrous when it is present; and again, it is of all present in Shakespeare.

he classic verse drama, and dramas in prose, were reed from consideration when we spoke of Shakespeare he one literary dramatist of the world; and on his le authority we assume that drama is a fit subject poetic treatment. We recollect no other instance of good poetic drama suitable for realistic stage reentation at long intervals of time. But a most imant consideration now follows; after all, Shakespeare s in literature, not on the stage; his influence is pernated and transmitted through literature, not through theatre. Some plays of Shakespeare are not acted at and for every time a play is acted it is read perhaps Illion times. The present writer knew his Shakespeare ost by heart before he went for the first time in his to see one of the great poet's plays performed at a atre. The play was "Hamlet"; Irving and Ellen ry were among the caste. "Well," said a friend, when vas over, "and what did you think of it?" "Two igs," was the reply; "first, if good poetic drama can acted, Shakespeare can; next, Shakespeare cannot acted. I was never so disappointed in my life." This took place more than twenty years ago, and the speaker on that occasion has not found it necessary to change his opinion.<sup>1</sup>

Drama, therefore, of this highest type, has a literary as well as a spectacular aspect.

We are now in a position to ask, have the dramas of Tennyson qualities that insure success in the theatre of the library or both? Before answering the question we shall do well to repeat that only one man has written plays which have achieved an unqualified reputation both or the stage and in the region of the higher literary art; and we have next to repeat that even Shakespeare is more read than acted in the present day.

Without attempting to discuss the question of decline in our modern drama, we may briefly notice some of the changes that have overtaken dramatic art since the days of Shakespeare. In his hands it had reached a perfection that is lost to it probably for ever. Into the lifeless product of the unities he had infused a new life by adjusting novel complexities to a nobler symmetry. His othe achievement was to educate up to this highest level of ar a nation that had lent him much of its own creative energy. All poetry is feigning; it is foolishness to those who have not learnt that the most real life may be sough in the regions of the ideal; and this loftiest form of the poetic art, the Shakespearian drama, is the most difficult to live up to.

Passing over the closing of theatres by the Puritans and the license of reaction that followed the Restoration we come to cheap printing. The drama could now be read at home, if read at all. But cheap printing made market for the novel, which is little better than dramated that the state of the state of pped of all the permanent adornments of art, and withany of its concentrated strength. Just as the poetic ma (and here the unities did good service) was the wning achievement of literary form, so the novel exits the most striking example of an ever-recurring tenncy to break loose from the fortifying and beautifying traints of form. The unities had prescribed for the y a reasonable beginning, middle, and end; they had igned to it those other due limits that alone enable the nan mind to comprehend the entirety of an artist's ation, to embrace all its beauty while the heart beats ce, to form of it a perfect and a perpetual image in the ad. From this we turn to the novel; one aspect alone I detain us; why should it be included within one ume or three volumes? why should it not extend to rty volumes? You cannot make every word of this culiar product of imaginative literature a part of your -and in a work of real literary art every word is vital, d every word can be remembered by reason of its exsite adaptation to every other word and to the whole. iefly on this account was poetry called into being. e play of Shakespeare is vastly more precious than the ire mass of prose fiction. Briefly, a novel is as a stone ng into the stagnant pool of some human existence: surface stirs lazily for a moment, then returns to its ad level of stagnation; and there is another stone at bottom for an idle weed to cling to.

<sup>1</sup> This may be an extreme case, but it finds a partial explanation in the remark on p. 312, "and then music must keep away from it"; also, in the words of Keats, "Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard Arsweeter."

Thus the British public are no longer compelled to take their way to a playhouse where they will receive acation in such high art as Shakespeare had provided; by can carry their theatre about in their pockets—a catre whose tendency is far less clevating. Hence there are too often debased by a novel. And w, when they go to the theatre, they go to stare at issuous if not sensual scenery, to admire the costume of an actress or to giggle at a farce. If the only modern is bill-sticking, the only modern drama is the ballet—"those gilt-gauds men-children swarm to see" (p. 307)

Of course, there is a large section of the public who cappreciate a good play, and make fit audience for a go poetic dramatist; but of the average playgoer the about is most frequently true. Blank verse of itself is a bar success; the verse that takes the popular ear is the jing of the "brainless pantomime" (p. 397). Truth must nobe dressed up in tawdrier garments; light or farci drama expressed in prose holds its own against anything in Shakespeare. This, again, may seem an ill-consider assertion; but we have merely to ask whether Shakespear blank verse ever had such a run as "Our Boys." Note the difference is enormous and altogether convincing.

Many other causes combine to make high class placomparatively unprofitable in our time; but they cannot specified here: enough may have been advanced to she that the poet-dramatist will at least find it difficult to fill the pockets of the proprietors of our modern English theat We may add the noteworthy fact that Tennyson I generally secured a better audience in the United State and the Colonies. Also, what has been said of the act poetic drama of to-day will be partly true of this drama its literary aspects; it cannot compete with the novel.

At the close of these preliminary considerations wen make the inquiry: What are the characteristics of Tonyson's dramatic work? The question will be paranswered in the following short notices of the seven plays. Meanwhile, a few general remarks may concluthis introductory section.

Long before the poet had written a single play, muless had attempted to put one on the boards of a theat most critics seemed to have made up their minds to Tennyson could not, or should not, write dramas. In the respect he suffered injustice both from reviewers and from the country of the c public. On the other hand, was it worth his while to empt this poetic drama? Possibly not. At least, we nnot admit the defence set up by some writers, that if ennyson lacks power to produce technically perfect etic drama, he lacks it with Homer and Dante, against nom it is never urged that they did not write in dramatic ms. This is surely absurd; first, these poets satisfy our st of greatness; apart from drama, each produced a rfect work on the grandest scale; second, they did not tempt drama, and, therefore, we bring no charge of amatic weakness against them. On the other hand, d Milton persisted in his second intention, and thrown Paradise Lost" into dramatic form "Samson Agonistes" es not concern us, and failed to satisfy dramatic reirements, he would have paid the penalty of being aced one or two classes lower; but his superb poetic stinct preserved him from that fate.

Tennyson certainly began too late. He had scarcely eed himself from Shakespeare when death overtook him. e has left us plays which are often very good reading, at he had not quite learnt to write with his eye on the age, to allow his characters to create themselves, to ake the dramatic end, and that alone, justify and enerze even the minutest dramatic development. His knowdie of plays was in excess of his experience as aywright, and that is one reason why he did not better lapt his genius to the conditions of his own day. It is spossible to regard his dramatic work as "The very age ed body of the time." Our age may not be favourable to rest creative poetry, whether dramatic or epic; yet, had begun earlier, all this might have been different. But e chose sashe remarked to Mr. Knowles—to respect the mitations. Therei re he began with the simplest funns froetry, passing analyally on to the more complex. Proably he was right, especially in such a doubtful epoch. lad he set his life on the cast of the drama he might have failed altogether before the hazard of the die. On other hand, his life, though long and fortunate, was o long enough to make him eminent as a lyric and a nar tive poet, and praiseworthy as a dramatic poet.

THE HISTORICAL PLAYS: "QUEEN MARY," "HAROL "BECKET."
Towards the close of "Harold," "Becket," and "Out

Mary" respectively, the following passages occur:

"William. Make them again one people Norman, English."

"John of Salisbury. Thou hast waged God's war against the King."

"Bagenhall. God save the Crown! the Papacy is no more."

In other words, the three plays illustrate three critiperiods in our national history, and thus form a kind trilogy. The first of these periods made England a natiwell governed, and a member of civilized Europe; is second did much to save England from the tyranny the in France enslaved the people until 1789; and the the was important in preventing England from becoming Catholic appendage of Catholic Spain.

Tennyson never worked without a conscience and aim, and we may be sure that one of his purposes in writithese historical dramas was to exhibit in an idealized fo three important stages of our national development.

But a great epoch is always the environment of grepersons; hence the poet would be able to embody the spin of each event in some leading character who should a give a name to his drama. In respect to the first and the second of these an interesting reference may be found "The Foresters": "I love him as a damsel of his of might have loved Harold the Saxon. . . Your green an fights not for himself, but for the people of Endand. . . . And how often in old histories have the great men striven against the stream, and how often in the low sweep of years to come must the great man strive again it again to save his country and the liberties of his people.

a man also was Tennyson's Robin Hood. As to the of these plays, Mary's death is Elizabeth's oppor-

7:

"Cecil. Never English monarch dying left England so little."
"Elizabeth. But with Cecil's aid, And others, if our person be secured, We will make England great."

"QUEEN MARY" (579).

Queen Mary" was published in 1875. The following , April 18th, it was played in an abridged form at the eum, with Miss Bateman as Queen Mary and Sir H. ng as Philip. In spite of clever acting and gorgeous ery the piece enjoyed only a short run. Tennyson's attempt to dramatize English history was also his t successful. The play is long, heavy, and dull. It s the most important element of all, a single and erful tragic force—force that moves swiftly to the issue carries all with it. Instead of this, two elements of susse confuse whatever interest they severally possess; the centres in Mary's anxiety to gain Philip for a husband, second in her anxious hope for the birth of a child. o, many of the characters have an interest that is too cial and apart from the major motives of the drama. ndeed, we may say that some of the characters are wn too well; but not Philip and Mary, who are excelt. Philip cold, sensual, selfish, on whose dead heart one word "policy" would be found written; and ry-no historian could ever do the unhappy queen h fair justice. But here we must be on our guard ninst a common error. A critic has been known to call Becket" Tennyson's greatest work because it was such ellent history. That might become the very reason y "Becket" should be his worst work, for good history y make bad drama. Apart from this question, the rtrait of Mary is admirable indeed. Many others of the characters are finely sketched, but, as observed at they often resemble separate studies rather than hu beings hurrying through the life of drama.

The dialogue is sometimes tedious, and delays action. The style and diction are severely bare and Seldom does the poet adorn his work with the imaginative beauty. The passage, "There runs a sha brook . . . " spoken by Lady Clarence in the fifth so of Act V., reminds us of the idyllic charm which Tenny has laid aside in order to adopt a somewhat formal self-conscious dramatic manner. We shall find more poetry in "Harold" and "Becket."

"HAROLD" (652)

appeared in 1876 (dated 1877). This play has never be put upon the stage, but the very considerable advance manifests in every department of dramatic business is ground for the statement hazarded on a former page to Tennyson began writing his dramas too late in Action, plot, dialogue,—singleness, continuity, and fur ment of interest—all these are better in "Harold" than "Queen Mary." The style is freer and wealthier; a although not flawless in respect of composition, especial as regards stage representation, the work is very reada both as play and poem. The most effective passage the reader—and it would be the same on the stage-the description of the fight at Senlac, where the chant of the monks is borne to us ever and again as the distance of the research and falls.

In one respect Harold and William bear a resemblar to Brutus and Octavius; the better man is no match the more cunning. Harold betrays at once his weakn and his strength in the lines, "How should the King England waste the fields Of England, his own people In the same spirit Brutus spared Mark Antony. Edith a noble character, and in her sudden transformation for to woman reminds us of some of Shakespeare's ines. Aldwyth's weakness is a foil to Edith's strength, it seems better to die with her who meets death aphantly, "Thy wife am I for ever and evermore," with the miserable schemer who lives only to wail a punishment is greater than I can bear." As Portia rutus over again in the form of a woman, so Edith be regarded as the counterpart of Harold, and then with is the shadow of William. And as it was with two women so may it be said of the two men—as myson himself has said it—better to fall with the with the two men in the portion of the said of the two men—as myson himself has said it—better to fall with the with the norman.

"BECKET" (693).

nough next in order in the Table of Contents, cket" was not published till 1884, before which date e Promise of May," "The Falcon," and "The Cup" been acted. But it naturally follows the other two rical plays.

gain the poet gives evidence of rapid progress in natic art, and his "Becket," whether read as printed, een on the stage as adapted by Sir H. Irving, may aps be considered as successful as any drama of the out of Shakespeare. The character of Becket is by ne best thing in the play. Next to this in interest, bound up with it, is the long struggle between Becket the King, from the game of chess in the first scene to nagnificent climax in the cathedral at the close. But oet was also fortunate in his creation of Rosamund de ord. By his treatment of her story he has secured an t which may be described as a bright idyllic vein ing through the dark mass of tragic ore. From ever point of view we regard the play, whether as to acter, plot, dialogue, or dramatic movement generally, nust pronounce it a powerful work; and again, coning the advanced age of the author and his limited experience in this the most difficult form of art, we ren convinced not only that he possessed dramatic genius, also that a difference of ten years might have made —if it be at all possible in our day—a great dramatist

"THE CUP" (750).

In 1881 this play was produced by Sir H. Irving at Lyceum, and with much success—a success that seem first sight out of proportion to the merit of the piece. it gained greatly by being short, concise, and not thoughtful for a modern taste. The story, which oc in Plutarch's "De Mulierum Virtutibus," is as follo Camma, wife of Sinnatus, Tetrarch of Galatia, is belo by Synorix, an ex-Tetrarch. He murders Sinnatus, a short time previously had saved his life. Camma to the Temple of Artemis.

In the second act, she is priestess of the temple. Synorix still pleads for her hand. Recognizing an op tunity of revenge, she consents to marry him—but in temple. According to the custom of the country, the must first "drink together from one cup." Camma poisoned the wine; and Synorix, who had been it to Galatia as well as a murderer, "Poor worm, cradown his own black hole;" and Camma goes "on her voyage" to meet Sinnatus.

"THE FALCON" (767).

"The Falcon" was produced at St. James's Ther December 18th, 1879. Mrs. Kendal represented Lady Giovanna. This comedietta of one scene is qui failure on the boards; and when reading it we have sations of the kind that used to be aroused by " Skipping Rope," and are reminded that Tennyson's sr is too grim for this sort of work. But the materia equally unsuited to its purpose; it is altogether too and bizarre to be amusing or even interesting. As a s ccaccio's "Decameron," or as a "Tale of a Wayside it may serve well enough; but no amount of inity could make good English Comedy out of elements reign, so fanciful, and so insufficient as Tennyson's con."

unt Federigo degli Alberighi loves the wealthy widow Lady Giovanna. He had loved her before her mar-, and now he spends all his money in the purchase diamond necklace that may win her favour. The t has a falcon that he loves almost as much as he the lady. It happens that her son, who is so ill that nother speaks of him as "my dying boy," has such a ng for the Count's falcon that nothing but the poson of it may save his life. The Lady Giovanna goes house of the penniless Count to beg the bird of him, he invites herself to breakfast. The Count's larder pty. He hesitates between his love for his falcon his love for Giovanna. He chooses the latter, and poor bird is killed to supply the table. While the is being prepared, the Count reminds Giovanna of early love. But the mother is most in her heart; he asks the falcon for her sick boy. Then she learns he Count has killed it for her sake, and she yields er love.

is sketch alone will reveal some of the many weaks inherent in the drama. The Count's love for his is a very doubtful motive to an English audience; the stronger motive that impelled the mother to each the Count, to beg of him what he loved so well, in from him when he withheld it, wastes itself in a y that is fatal to the other dramatic issues.

"THE PROMISE OF MAY" (778). is play was produced at the Globe Theatre, Noveme Student's Tale -" The Falcon of Sir Federigo."-LONGFELLOW.

ber 11th, 1882, under the direction of Mrs. Bernard-E It was a complete failure. On the night of Nove 14th of the same year, as the piece was nearing the of the first act, the Marquis of Queensberry sprang t feet exclaiming "I beg to protest . . . "; but ad "I will wait till the end of the act," he returned t seat. When the curtain had fallen he again stood up, confessing himself an agnostic, declared that Tenny Edgar was an "abominable caricature" into whose me the poet had put sentiments that did not exist an freethinkers.

The passages in the play to which the speaker refe are the long soliloquy of Edgar, beginning "Jealous o with Eva!" and some of the speeches which subseque in the same act he addresses to Eva. Had the man understood Tennyson's method of dealing with such jects (see p. 378), and his habit of expressing him through the lips of a character purposely exaggerate both of which he might have learnt from the two "Lock Halls" and "Maud"; or had Tennyson, on the o hand, been content with the monodramatic pulpit f which he had so often thundered unanswerable, painful scene at the Globe might have been avoi-What Tennyson seizes upon in such cases, is the tender the agnostic of to-day can afford to be moral; he mus moral; morality is in the air he breathes; it flows his veins; he shakes it everywhere by the hand; sternest truth of all, he is heir to the glorious humani fought for and won by century after century of Chris life. He cannot spend this inheritance in a day; living henceforth without an ideal, he or his children a him will squander the priceless bequest. We cannot even in the nineteenth century -live by bread alone:

> "A soul with no religion— My mother used to say that such a one Was without rudder, anchor, compass—might be Blown every way with every gust, and wreck On any rock."

Promise of May, Act III

bee thou fail not," were Tennyson's words of appreson and warning so long before as 1850 ("In Meam," xxxiii.); and this drama of "The Promise of "is a latter-day sermon on the old text.

hile we are regarding the play in its ethical aspect, may remember the significance of mere titles in yson, and briefly consider the words "The Promise ay." The tragic note is struck early, and their first obvious interpretation will be found at the beginning ell as the end of the drama—"O joy for the promise of .... O grief for the promise of May." The salt of agnosticism will wither away the beauty from e and from human life; a kite will stoop down and the cooing of the dove. Or again, near the end, we that five years of shame and suffering have broken eart of one so lovely in the promise of her May. It man therefore, the mainstay of society, who will have to fear from such a disruption of society as the poet ns of. From first to last Tennyson refuses to believe woman can ever be identified with man; from first st he assigns to her a position in which, if we may e from this play, she can retain one at least of her prerogatives; for though in future years man may any longer permit her to be a blessing to him, he not withhold from her the privilege of suffering for nt, as already hinted, the stage is no safe place for ching a sermon. "The Promise of May" suffered internally and externally from a pronounced ethical ation. The poet probably fondled his moral purpose the detriment of his dramatic duties; and a section the public came prepared to express disapproval.

what they regarded as a repulsive character place situations of doubtful propriety.

Yet the failure of the play should be traced, no character nor morality nor incident, but to general a ness of composition. Still, it would be a pity if a containing so much of the wealth and the beauty of g should be lost sight of, or remembered only as a lit curiosity. And it is by no means impossible that 'Promise of May' will be read and admired when ethical novel of our time has long been forgotten.

"THE FORESTERS" (857).

This romantic pastoral drama was produced at I. Theatre, New York, on the 19th of March, 1892. A weeks later it was published by Messrs. Macmillan met with good fortune on the American stage; an have before noticed, among the varying condition dramatic success, that Tennyson's plays have somet been appreciated by the younger England when they failed to satisfy the mother country.

This latest of Tennyson's dramas is ever more SI spearcan than the historical plays; yet it is not so suit nor so consistently Shakespearcan as they are. But one does not see why it need be Shakespearcan a The mere fact that it copies the manner of one man bygone age makes it much less interesting to us.

Next, we can hardly fail to detect an unpleasant ment of burlesque or pantomime which may imply the poet was determined in this instance to write dow the modern stage, if he had not the strength to lift it to level. The Fairy Scene, fortunately, is not like anyt in Shakespeare. Once more we are reminded of "Skipping Rope"; for this scene is sheer pantomime has nothing in common with the delicate grace of elves in "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Someth it in manner, but less obtrusive, is the dialogue een Robin and Marian at the opening of Act IV. -

"Marian. The sweet light of a mother's eye, That beam of dawn upon the opening flower. . . ."

Shakespeare were writing the scene, he might put language into the mouth of Robin, but not of Marian lovesick Orlando, but not of smart Rosalind. Further e read:

"Marian. And out upon all simple batchelors! Ah well! thou seest the land has come between us, And my sick father here has come between us, And this rich Sheriff too has come between us; So is it not all over now between us?"

again a few lines further on:

"Marian. What wilt thou do with the bond then?

Robin. Wait and see.

What wilt thou do with the Sheriff?

Marian. Wait and see."

se two passages are below the standard of "As You It"; to find parallels we should have to refer to ye's Labour's Lost." And in such passages, again, car lest the poet may seem to "flicker down to brain-pantonnine," or at the least to low comedy.

roun this consideration of the dialogue, we should rally proceed to the characters; Marian, for example, rding to the scene, or the part of the scene, is liable range, not her mood, but her personality; in fact, as play goes forward, she catches the manners of some dozen of the heroines of Shakespeare.

at these trifling violations of dramatic propriety vanish gether from our mind as we think of the great poet, of advanced age, his sylvan theme, his charming play. By plea were needed, he has one formulated in words ten by his Robin Hood:—"Being out of the law, how ald we break the law? if we broke into it again we should break the law, and then we were no longer laws."

Before taking leave of Tennyson's dramas, a should be said about the songs. Two of these in 'Foresters' had appeared before; the song in Ac "There is no land like England," is adapted from "National Song" of the 1830 volume; and the "Review" for March, 1891, first published the musica mournful "To Sleep!" in Act I., Scene 3. The son the dramas generally are excellent in themselves appropriate to the context.

CHAPTER XV.

"DEMETER AND OTHER POEMS."

METER and Other Poems" was published on Decemgth, 1889, and it is said that 20,000 copies were sold a a week. Tennyson was now eighty years of age; Ithough in this and the other late volumes we may youthful fancy and ardour, we discover maturity of nation fine as ever and a strengthening sobriety of ht. Nor does the art form suffer except from an ional laxity. We may add that at this stage a new ion of date will sometimes arise; we shall now have uire, how recent is this poem? is it the production to poet of fourscore years, or was it found on "sallow as of manuscript"?

4) "TO THE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA." yson's younger son, Lionel, was attacked by fever in and died on his journey home, 20th April, 1886. at received great kindness from Lord Dufferin, to he became much attached. In the rhythm o hender poem a very notable line occurs—"Fell—and into the Red Sea." No such variation of the tal structure occurs in all the stanzas of "In Memi"; nearest would come the line, "On the bald street breaks the blank day" (ix.). The "Might been" is from "In Memoriam," lxxv. 4.

(805) "ON THE JUBILEE OF QUEEN VICTORIA." I lines are another experiment in metrical contrast, but a very successful one. They were first publishe "Macmillan's Magazine," for April, 1887, under the of "Carmen Seculare." The characteristic section and xi. further illustrate some remarks which with found on many former pages, such as 25-28, 266, 378

(806) "DEMETER AND PERSEPHONE (IN ENNA)." lines to Professor Jebb contain a very apt figure, the wheat which after thousands of years of buring Egypt bore sweet grain in England. But the sto Ceres and Proserpine, long buried in its Sicilian has blossomed on our colder island into an alien flat is useless to ask which is the more beautiful, the classic legend or the modern adaptation of it in Toson's "Demeter and Persephone"; both are beautiful, when the content is the content in the content is the content in the content is the content in th

Tennyson's poem is the occasion of yet another a magnificent song to the honour and glory of mothers and the Earth-mother becomes a type of all the moof humanity. Among the many modern touches give the classic theme, the most notable is Demeter's "indeed . . . ," and her interpretation of the dark soft the Fates, "There is a Fate beyond us"; the c ground is abandoned abruptly when we read of you kindlier gods who will "send the noon into the night break The sunless halls of Hades into Heaven."

To his title, "Demeter and Persephone," the poet the words "in Enna," because he gives us only one ep of the story; but into that one episode he contriv explained by the following abstract from Ovid's amorphoses," at the end of which it will be added. sephone, daughter of Demeter and Zeus, is carried Dis whilst she is gathering flowers in the fields near in Sicily. Dis descends with her to Hades, where ecomes his queen. Meanwhile, the mother seeks tughter through all lands—"The world was too little er in this search." When at last she learns her teter's fate, she appeals to Zeus, who, after some r, arranges that Persephone shall live half the year ner husband, and half with her mother. In Tennypoem the mother pours out her heart to her child irst reclaimed.

<sup>1</sup> Belike the tale, wept over otherwhere
Of those old days is clean forgotten there."

The Earthly Paradise,

ch of the material of "Demeter and Persephone" is cal in origin, yet enough remains of Tennyson's own, er of thought or form, to fill us with wonder and ation. Close examination of the poem will further old familiar phrases and sentiments of which the ing are a few examples: "climate-changing bird," no more," "from state to state," "thro' clouded ries"; "the wail of midnight winds," that "shrilled answer." The "shrilly whinnyings" may be comwith the "whinny shrills" of "The Princess"; also is a form of "thridded."

tyle the poem comes nearest to "Tithonus"; only rse is more bountiful and joyous and made almost ate with the yearning love of a mother for her Of all the classical pieces this is the most tenderly th.

"OWD ROÄ." (See p. 269, footnote.) With as of humour here and there, a farmer tells his son ald Rover saved the lad's life ten years before.

) "VASTNESS" was published in "Macmillan's

Magazine," March, 1885. Much may be learnt fron title of this poem, and much from the "Epilogue to Charge of the Heavy Brigade":

"The vast sun-cluster's gather'd blaze . . . Amaze brief humanities—no! . . . . the man remains." No viction is so constantly forced upon Tennyson as this we end in being our own corpse-coffins, then life better than "a trouble of ants in the gleam of a million of suns." But in this vastness lives our harmonic with the second of infinity all is well; "the dead are not dead alive."

For other expressions of this belief see "In Memor xxxiv., xxxv.; "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," 30 and there are yet more, especially of this later possible. Here again we have the history of the poet's many illusions, followed by an impetuous assertion of hope in this respect as in some others, the poem of resembles "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After." Fo example of the first, we may mention stanza 7, velas with commerce; and as to the second, in spite of vagueness of the close, the poem is powerful and im sive, and with the main argument we may compare Is

"For dreary were this earth, if earth were all, Tho' brighten'd oft by dear Affection's kiss."

(E13) "THE RING." Here a story, improbable, a some other respects like the story of "The Sisters," schiefly as a frame for much picturesque philosophy would seem that as the great poet drew towards his earnd, his thoughts wandered oftener and farther be the confines of earth; and in his autumn he frequency on the eternal miracle of spring.

At the outset of this existence—as stated in "De fundis,"—we wail being born; but in "The Ring dead have "gone up so far" that they too are losing ents of earth as we forget our pain of birth and our at for antenatal life. This theory of "Æonian Evoluis set forth towards the end of the poem; but it is in another passage near the beginning:—"No in heaven, nor sudden hell; My Miriam breaks her earthly link With me to-day."

us then the dead may linger lovingly about us for e. But in "In Memoriam," xli.-xlvii., li., lxxxv., xciii., cxxx., the poet inclines to the belief that the bond a binds the dead to the living is never broken. And in Sisters" we find no hint of final separation; the who loved them both has reached "the quiet of ting life," and yet they glide about him still.

in "Rizpah" and other poems, the wind becomes dium of communication between "the Ghost in and "the Ghost that once was Man,"—"one silent Came on the wind": and similarly in four or five passages. Beautiful is the line, "And utter knowis but utter love"; which condenses the fuller that of "In Memoriam," li., and lxxvv. 6, 7, 20-23, and apilogue," 36 and 37. Also we notice that, as once the poet speaks of a light in the eyes of the dead omes from the other life.

myson never wholly rids himself of the older notion, made the woman for the use of man"; this is er instance in which "The Ring" resembles "The s." The attitude of the man is entirely condescendant so much in this poem as in many others; though "No voice for either spoke within my heart"; and is looked upon as a bride to be won by a ring; and of course, are in love with a man whose intimacy is at an unknown quantity. Also, at the end, "the woman-world" is—as it was in "The Princess" In Memorian: "—the world "Of wives and mothers." the same in "Becket"—"So rare the household r-making bee, Man's help."

The poem contains much beauty of language an scription, some of it old, some new :- "A tho squares of corn and meadow"; "Made every mom her after life A virgin victim to her memory"; "M with a kindly pinch Each poor pale cheek a mome rose"; "The tiny fist Had grasped a daisy from mother's grave"; the figure following, "I gazed in mirror"; and the passage beginning, "My people were scared with eerie sounds"; all these are of T son's best. The expression "all-in-all" again occu has done duty very often indeed; "that All-in ("Akbar's Dream"). We recognize also "Æoniar loved and love," "statue-like,' and the rest. But important to our purpose at this stage of our inqu the verse structure; absolutely bad lines are always in Tennyson; the most daring experiments occur in Princess"; yet it may be doubted whether there is a reprehensible line in that poem. Here we may fin occasionally :- "And all ablaze too plunging in lake"; "At times, too, shrilling in her angrier mood

(821) "FORLORN." As so often in Tennyson, amoften in Shelley, the metre and the thought are as and bridegroom. In this ballad it might seem that mere metrical arrangement could by itself tell the transferous shame and shuddering despair. As to the itself, it is another of this series of stern lessons be on the relation between the sexes; though we may of whether the poet has not weakened rather than st thened his poem by adding disease to crime—"You lie with wasted lungs,"

(822) "HAPPY—THE LEPER'S BRIDE." In this b on the other hand disease purifies love; "Happy" fo "Forlorn," and not without purpose; the principle illustrate is the same; the sacredness of love, the sar narriage; but the first poem, if not the second also, lers on the repulsive. Again, in "Happy," Tennyson trates the "human ghost" from the "poor rib-grated geon of the body"; and as in "In Memoriam," ms exxii. and lxxxv., "moving each to music" they all flash thro'one another." But Tennyson has told us "The living soul" of this 85th poem is not Hallam's, the "general soul." The cheerful metre of "Happy" nold one made delightfully new.

in this to W. G. Palgrave, the lines run on without a ak; and it is curious to note the novel music of the h Memoriam" stanza. The poem contains light, clear teches of nature; and in poetical guise gives its own e—"The century's three strong eights."

826) "To Mary Boyle." There is something of race in this little ode, but much more that Horace ald not have written. It is graceful, thoughtful, pathetic; it is less hopeful than Tennyson's wont. Addressed a woman, the stanzas are delicate and the tone is femile. It was just the opposite with the verses "To E. zgerald" and "To Ulysses." The half a hundred are and the rick-fire days, of which the poet makes a ure in the fourth Canto of "The Princess," take us ck to Somersby, which the Tennysons did not leave 1837.

(827) "THE PROGRESS OF SPRING." This poem, Found yesterday—forgotten mine own rhyme By mine I self," and dating about 1836, is apparently not quite ished; but it would be difficult to find a more delightful more spiritual study of the gradual yearly return of e and beauty to the English landscape.

(829) "MERLIN AND THE GLEAM." This poem like an expansion of two lines in "Freedom":

"O follower of the Vision, still In motion to the distant gleam," to which may be added "The Voyage," when "on Vision ever fled. . . . And still we followed where she

As we approach the end of the volume, the p become more personal and more sacred. In this, th the metre is almost archaic, we have a beautiful and to ing description of the life of the great artist, who in ing the ideal probably achieved more real good fo modern higher life than any other man of his time. the gleam flickered above the springs of fancy, the ten years, repelled by the croak of critics, it retreated the poet followed still, and it glanced on lyric and m logue and idyll, it illumined the legend of Arthur King, threw a divine light on the lament for A Hallam, mingled a ray of immortality with the mele that sang through the world in later years; and having led the poet to the land's last limit, it stood he ing "on the border Of boundless Ocean, And all be Heaven,"

In section 9, those whose journey lies before them bidden to follow the Gleam. For these the quest of it truth and beauty should be easier now that the gmagician has trodden all their road, leaving footp into which they may press their steps. To make t footprints clearer is the main purpose of this "Handle to Tennyson."

The poet had already chosen Merlin as a nom de pl when he contributed "Britons guard your own" and o poems to "The Examiner," in 1852.

It is not easy to piece out the allegory of "Merlin the Gleam." The poet traverses life from the "morr hills" down by cataract and wilderness over the leve cean shore. Those he leaves behind are young ers charged to launch their vessel upon the ocean is about to withdraw his being to its own (p. 371).

"ROMNEY'S REMORSE." This is yet another ounded on the relationship of marriage. An artist ad deserted his wife in order that he might be free ow art, comes back to her at last, and dies blest by ving care. "To you my days have been a life-long afted on half a truth," the half-truth being Sir a's remark that "marriage spoilt an artist." This uth looks a whole falsehood in the searching light ch another poem as "The Wreck," or in such a ace as the following from this poem, "The world lose, if such a wife as you Should vanish unrel"; or again, where the artist says of his desertion, truth will damn me with the mindless mob." Here rson takes up once more his unthankful theme of se criticism in life or after death. The mindless first of all, are exposed to his contempt as often as speare's; but with Shakespeare there was a differ-Next, he would again anticipate the "myriad lies lacken round The corpse of every man that gains a " How strange it is, and how sad withal, that the poet who could write a line like this, "What is true t shall tell," should by his querulous apprehensions own upon himself some of the condemnation which last scene in the history of this half-truth is laid in er world than ours-"Why left you wife and child?

y sake? According to my word? . . . . " ere are good things in the poem-the lovely picture other and child, "I dream'd last night. . . ." We with the staghorn moss, the white heather, the placid the falling water, the murmuring bee, and all the and beauty of the mountain side.

"What artist ever yet Could make pure light liv the canvas?" "the chasm between Work and Ideal, deeply interesting as expressions relating to art. By side of the first we place Browning's "And so they better painted"; the second is a truism of every true a

(834) "PARNASSUS." The purport of the quota from Horace is as follows:

"My work is finished. Yea, this book of song Is Flaccus' stately monument, more strong, More lasting than the proud memorial brass, Than brazen-moulded bust. It doth surpass The height of regal pyramid; no shower Shall this corrode, nor have the north winds power On this, to shake it, nor the all-conquering years, Nay, nor the yearless zons."

Horace suggests the theme, but not its unexpdevelopment.

The poets on the summit of "Parnassus" have beautiful crowned forms; may he be one with trolling his music till it mingles with the music of spheres. But! there stand also—in modern times shapes, not beautiful, but huge, ever huger, dwarfin muses, deadening their song.

For the voice of Geology is that of an "ever-bre shore That tumbled in the Godless deep," and more for still is the funeral chant of Astronomy:

"Stars and systems through dead space are drifting, To shine no more."

In "Literary Squabbles" we hear both of these to Muses rolling their doom. "Parnassus" has nothing do with the inroads made by science into the region emotion and imagination; it is merely the counter retion to "Quod non... possit diruere..." counter reflection that might also be set down in La

&quot;Nec me animi fallit, quam res nova miraque menti Accidat, exitium cœli terræque futurum."

The sight confuses," says Tennyson.

"Et quam difficile id mihi sit pervincere dictis," nere is a third reflection. This also we shall find in Tennyson and Lucretius:

Lucretius.

"In a boundless universe
Is boundless better, boundless worse"—

Two Voices.

"Sic igitur mundi naturam totius ætas Mutat, et ex alio terram status excipit alter, Quod potuit, nequeat; possit, quod non tulit ante."

De Revum Natura.

Section III. of "Parnassus" Tennyson reaches and his predecessor on the poetic throne:

"If thou, indeed, derive thy light from Heaven,
Then to the measure of that heaven-born light,
Shine, Poet! in thy place, and be content."

WORDSWORTH.

34) "BY AN EVOLUTIONIST." As bodily existence given to us in order that we might learn the "me" the "not me" ("In Memoriam," xlv.), so also was it in to us that we might "move upwards" by "working the beast"; which reminds us of Milton's "Till body to spirit work."

his, then, is the Ascent of Man from one point of view.

by we were told in "In Memoriam" that only thus the the ascent be made. The doctrine is fully stated in fifty-third section of that poem.

but the first stanza of "By an Evolutionist" implies t "we are raised a spiritual body." We are raised in by death, as well as by a life that works out the st.

one thought remains. These are the reflections of age; as the aged man who "hears the yelp of the beast"; "in Past" he "sank with the body at times." The doctrine therefore of "In Memoriam," liii. must not be prea as a truth to the young that eddy round and re Still, let us hope that there are exceptional cases in we the beast is worked out earlier—in middle age, y childhood.

The poem is a little uncouth in form and in though

- (835) "FAR-FAR-AWAY." (See Appendix to Chap.
- (835) "POLITICS." (See p. 21.)
- (835) "BEAUTIFUL CITY." "The red fool-fury of Seine" has all along been eyed with suspicion by our These lines may date near to 1889, for we have met "raving Paris" so recently as "Locksley Hall Stycars After." In that poem also may be found a count of kindred thought, "And Reversion ever dragge Evolution in the mud."
- (836) "THE ROSES ON THE TERRACE." These I were probably addressed to a sister of Mary Boyle. (p. 423.)
- (836) "THE PLAY," may have been suggested Quarles:

"My soul, sit thou a patient looker-on, Judge not the play before the play is done. Its plot has many changes: ev'ry day Speaks a new scene: the last act crowns the play."

"Gloom'd" in the first line is one of Tennyson's ear words. As a participle it is awkward. Of these four li the first and third are very poor.

(836) "ON ONE WHO AFFECTED AN EFFEMINA MANNER." (836) "TO ONE WHO RAN DOWN TENGLISH." Like "The Play," these two pieces that foll it are "poor indeed."

336) "THE SNOWDROP." Spelt by age, this trifle claim to our respect.

836) "THE THROSTLE." ("The New Review," October, 9.)—But this is something very different. Its only ul, as far as we can recollect, is Mr. Swinburne's ylus." Also it may be compared with Tennyson's lier effort, "The Owl"; and with "The Swallow ag" in "The Princess."

836) "THE OAK"—This is another inspiration, of ich the briefest criticism will also be the best. The ng described and the describing verse have grown orporate into one monumental Being.

837) "IN MEMORIAM—W. G. WARD." The subject these memorial lines was William George Ward, the ologian, who died in 1882. He was the author of deal of a Christian Church, etc.," a work whose ultrantanism was described by Dr. Pusey as being "veryong."

CHAPTER XVI.

"THE DEATH OF ŒNONE, AKBAR'S DREA AND OTHER POEMS." 1

LORD TENNYSON died on the 6th of October, 1892, at this last volume was published a few weeks later. mournful sacredness invests its pages, and criticism sho speak softly. The book opens with a beautiful and t der dedication to his wife—" June Bracken a Heather."

- (838) "TO THE MASTER OF BALLIOL."—These lit to the late Professor Jowett contain an allusion to "downward thunder of the brook," which in the f'Œnone" fell "In cataract after cataract to the sea."
  - (838) "THE DEATH OF ŒNONE."—As we left to lonely mountain nymph of the earlier poem, the noise

<sup>1</sup> Omitted poems of Tennyson's later years are some introductory ve to "Rosa Rosarum," by E. V. B. (the Hon. Mrs. Boyle), (1884); a stacontributed to a small pamphlet printed for the benefit of the Chelsea Host for Women (March, 1884); a stanza in the volume of his poems that presented to the Princess Louise of Schleswig-Holstein by representat of the nurses of England; lines on the christening of the infant daughte the Duchess of Fife; lines to the memory of J. R. Lowell; and a prefat stanza of four lines to "Pearl" (edited by Mr. Israel Gollancz).

tle was ringing in our ears. Now the ten years' war of by is over; but in her cave (Enone sits still desolate; wandering ivy and vine that hung in rich festoons are all cords dripping with the wintry mist. Through se her sad eyes look down the long glen, or rest on a naked bower where once she saw her Paris judge gods. On a sudden he comes again, no longer beautus as a god, but livid, moaning, pierced by a poisoned at. Only Enone may heal his wound—"Go back to the ne adulteress and die."

He groaned, turned, passed downward through the mist, headlong dead. The mountain shepherds came; by built for their old playmate a funeral pyre. In her cam she heard a wailing, "Come to me, Enone!" Led the silent cry and the low gleam of death, she paced a torrent path, to the broader vale, came to the pile, st herself upon it, and past in fire with him.

It would be idle to speak of this poem as betraying le or no falling off in power or beauty. As a fact it esents signs of decaying strength in every aspect, and ould certainly be among the latest compositions of the et. The story can scarcely bear a classic name; its e classical element is the unforgiving daughter of the er-god; and, of course, there is some local colouring, ch as mountain shepherds and the funeral pyre. The scriptive passages are less striking, and less perfect. t they possess nearly all the old charm; they are well apted to the wintry theme, and they are sparse accordrly; yet "Which drowsed in gloom, self-darken'd from west"; "She waked a bird of prey that screamed and st," are examples which to those who recall the poet's lier imagery must seem a little at fault. The verse ows more signs of weakness; it has not entirely lost the I movement and melody, but at times it falters. The very st line runs into the second after the manner of certain rses in "The Princess," rather than that of the classical poems. In "The Princess," moreover, nearly every pe sonage who comes on the stage makes his or her strong accented bow from the forefront of the line, and pauses: "The Princess, liker to the inhabitant . . . " "Meliss with her hand upon the lock . . . "; and although the po ture is not unknown in the earlier classical poems and the "Idylls of the King," yet Paris three times occupies th prominent position in the later "(Enone." This may l of design; but turning to peculiarities not of design, v may point out the following among many lines that drag "Amazed, and ever seeming stared upon . . . " "Or raised the Prince, one sleek'd the squalid hair"; "Which drowsed in gloom, self-darken'd from the west": "H face deform'd by lurid blotch and blain"; "Fell headlor dead; and of the shepherds one . . . ." This last lin which is the most striking example, will also discoverdo many of the others-the extent to which the master hand has lost its cunning in the arrangement of vow sounds. But the subject cannot be pursued further.

And now, on the other hand, we have one more those many beautiful and often sad stories arising out married love or the loss of it, which the poet has delighte to tell in his latter years. We might see in "The Deat of (Enone" the counterpart of "Romney's Remorse" add to that poem the word "Adulterer," and the traged enacted on the mountain slope by Ilion becomes possible even in the nineteenth century.

But lastly, in deep reverence to goddess and nymp and demigod, and to the great poet who has so ofte newly-created both these and their divine abodes, we may thankfully read "The Death of Œnone" as a "Grecia tale re-told."

(840) "St. Telemachus." There are fewer signs of clining power in this poem; the extra syllables in the ank verse—"That Rome no more should wallow in this I lust"—might scarcely determine a recent date. It may nearly belong to the most perfect period of Tennya's authorship. Some of the descriptive passages are refine—the call of God that drove Telemachus to Rome; eunchristian splendour of the Christian city; the pagan owd; the Colosseum where 80,000 Christians watched an murder man; his deed that woke the world. The amatic situation is a noble one; the saint who had so any been lazying out his life in self-suppression, makes ift atonement by one deed of self-sacrifice.

<sup>1</sup> Re-told also-or part of it-by Landor and William Morris,

(842) "AKBAR'S DREAM." This fine poem breathes of at tolerance and love and peace which possesses great d good souls when nearing their earthly goal. Akbar, e Tennyson himself, seeks "To spread the Divine Faith Like calming oil on all their stormy creeds."

ne figure here employed is but one in a poem peculiarly the in metaphor—"The wild horse, anger, plunged to ag me, and failed"; "To hunt the tiger of oppression t"; "Those cobras ever setting up their hoods"; are few among many. Very interesting is the prophecy ter the event—"From out the sunset poured . . . . My assion be accomplished"; and a graceful poetic tribute our Indian Empire. The Hymn to the Sun at the ose is in Tennyson's happiest manner.

(847) "THE BANDIT'S DEATH" has much but not of the old dramatic power and picturesqueness. A oman lives with a bandit who killed her husband. She ars him a son—a link between them. Some time after is, when they are hiding from soldiers, the bandit rangles the child, lest its crying should betray them; he curses himself for the deed, yet sleeps. Then the mothe kills the bandit with the dagger that has slain her husband. The peculiarity of "The Bandit's Death" is that of a double motive. It would seem as though in this last poen Tennyson strove to blend the instincts of wifehood and motherhood into one stronger passion. But our divided interest militates against his purpose; although we may understand that whereas the wife merely endured a murderer, the mother struck him dead.

(848) "THE CHURCH-WARDEN AND THE CURATE. Of all the poems in dialect this is perhaps the moshumorous. It is founded on a tale told in the Memoir of Julian Young. (See p. 269, footnote.)

(850) "CHARITY." This is the last of the many poem -mostly dramatic monologues-that are founded on th relation of the sexes. A woman who has been ruined i dressing a grave with flowers. She is approached b another beast of prey in the form of a man-the friend of him who had ruined her. She reads him a stern lesson an then tells the story of the grave - " 'Will you move a little that way? your shadow falls on the grave.' He marrie the heiress of half a shire: I sent him a wail and a curs and his money. He was killed in the train; and his will was widowed on her bridal day. But she found my lette upon him; she came and nursed me when my dead chil was born. At last I learnt who the Christ-like creatur was; together we prayed for him. She became a hospita nurse, and died of a fever caught in the wards. She ha left me money. God sees not her like anywhere in th pitiless world. 'Get you gone; I am dressing her grav

The poem is better than "The Bandit's Death;" and the subject befits the pen of one that writes amid the closing scenes of life. It is the story of George Eliot Romola," and it carries with it the same moral-" Man, an you even guess at the love of a soul for a soul?"

(851) "KAPIOLANI" is less advanced in doctrine than Akbar's Dream"; Akbar desired to worship beneath a dome of nobler span" than pagod, mosque, or church; apiolani would worship in church rather than pagod; ould abjure the Spirit of Evil, and call on the power lored by the Christian.

(852) "THE DAWN." This is an expansion of two nes added to the first edition of the "Ode sung at the pening of the International Exhibition":

> "Is the time so far away? Far-how far no tongue can say."

In "The Princess" the thought is more hopefully pressed:

> "This fine old world of ours is but a child Yet in the go-cart. Patience ! Give it time To learn its limbs: there is a hand that guides."

at now, looking back upon a long life, the poet will turally mourn over the slow Ascent of Man.

(852) "THE MAKING OF MAN." And here, after oking at that darker side of doubt, and in the mood of action so habitual to him, the poet fixes his prophetic e where even the fainter red of the dawn is fading away the light of a rising sun.

(853) "THE DREAMER." This is a cast into a deeper ure. "The Making of Man" concerned itself with this rth that we sometimes care to cherish and to deem orthy of the Maker; "where the races flower and fade . till the peoples all are one." But while earth follows Sun, the Sun himself is racing from heaven to heaven:

and in the eternal making of the frame of things, less is t be lost than won; the Reign of the Meek may begi upon earth, but their reign shall know no end; merged i the music of the spheres, the fitful moan of earth sha become an everlasting harmony.

(853) "MECHANOPHILUS." A deeply interesting elaboration of the following couplet of "Locksley Hall:

"Men, my brothers, men the workers, ever reaping something new; That which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do.

The poem is an unqualified pæan to practical scient and the industries. In later life the poet would have added language like Ruskin's in the preface to "Sesan and Lilies," new edition; or like Carlyle's at the time the first exhibition; or like his own in "Locksley Haw Sixty Years After"—"Art and grace are less and less As in the seventh stanza, both form and substance a occasionally imperfect.

- (854) "RIFLEMEN FORM." In "The Times" for M 9th, 1859, these patriotic verses, now slightly altered were entitled "The War," and were followed by the signature "T." Owing to the hostile attitude of France the War Office, in May, 1859, sanctioned the establishment of Volunteers, and before the end of the year near 200,000 were enrolled in our citizen army.
- (854) "THE TOURNEY." A spirited ballad of times when men fought themselves into a lady's favour
- (854) "THE WANDERER." A simple lay of hospital and the grateful guest.
- (855) "POETS AND CRITICS." These last words to critics are less ungracious; had none others appear fore them, they would have been more worthy of a place the volume. We may be ill-advised, but we venture to mk that in these pages also "perfect stillness" would best. The critic was never so kindly, so sagacious, r so much of an artist as in the days of Matthew Arnold 1 his successors. As to the "But seldom comes the et here," it takes the tone of Horace:

"Mediocribus esse poetis Non homines, non di non concessere columnæ."

e hear it also in "The Poet," "The Poet's Mind," and oets, those rare souls," in "The Princess." Longfellow, newhere, has a beautiful thought for the poet who is ond or third, or yet more humbly placed in the world's eem; and this chance reference to Longfellow brings our mind his well-known lines, so unassuming and so ming:

"If any thought of mine, or sung or told, Has ever given delight or consolation, Ye have repaid me back a thousandfold."

congfellow may not be a great poet in the eyes of the rld; but, strange to say, there are times when we ald not wish him greater.

855) "A VOICE SPAKE OUT OF THE SKIES." This variation of the doctrine so often insisted upon by mayson, and set forth in its finest form in "Locksley Il Sixty Years After":

"Take the charm 'for ever' from them, and they crumble into dust."

855) "DOUBT AND PRAYER." (855) "FAITH." (855) HE SZLENT VOICES." (856) "GOD AND THE UNICES." In these four sacred poems the poet already ds communion with an unseen world; but at times he as lovingly towards us whom he is leaving, and his rds have a power that can never pass away.

(856) "THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE" ("Nineteenth Century," February, 1892). Eight months before his own death, Tennyson discharged this last sad duty as Laureate; and the lines are strikingly appropriate as the final message from a great poet to a sorrowing people.

(894) "CROSSING THE BAR."

Beloved Guide, unchanging Friend, No sadness of farewell from me, No nurmur at death's mystery, For thou art with me till the end. Oct. 6th, 1892.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

- Frederick Tennyson b.
- 8 Charles Tennyson b.
- Alfred Tennyson b. (Aug. 6).
- Arthur Hallam b.
- 5 Tennyson entered Louth Grammar School.
- Tennyson left Louth Grammar School at Christmas.
- 5-7 Poems by Two Brothers.
- 3 Tennyson enters Trinity College, Cambridge (Oct. 28). Friendship with Hallam begins. The Lover's Tale.
- Timbuctoo.
- Department of Poems, chiefly Lyrical (Published by E. Wilson).

  Tennyson and Hallam visited the Pyrenees to
  - gether.
- Tennyson contributed Anacreontics, No More, and A Fragment to "The Gem." Also a Sonnet Check every outflash, every ruder sally to "The Englishman's Magazine" for August. Tennyson's father died, and the poet left Cambridge.
- 2 Contributed a Sonnet Me my own fate to lasting sorrow doometh to "Friendship's Offering;" also a Sonnet There are three things which fill my heart with sighs to "The Yorkshire Literary Annual."
- 2-3 Poems, by Alfred Tennyson (Published by Moxon). 3 The Lover's Tale printed and suppressed. Reprinted

Check every outflash . . . in "Friendship' Offering." A. Hallam died at Vienna, Sept. 13.

1834 Hallam buried at Clevedon, Jan. 3rd.

1837 Contributed O that 'twere possible to "The Tribute, and St. Agnes to "The Keepsake." The Tennyson leave Somersby.

1838 Tennyson in London joins the Anonymous Club which includes Carlyle, Sterling, Thackeray Forster, Lushington, Macready, Landor.

1842 Poems, by Alfred Tennyson, in Two Volumes Cecilia Tennyson married Edward Law Lushing ton (Oct. 10th).

1845 Tennyson receives a pension of f, 200.

1846 Contributed to "Punch" The New Timon and the Poets (Feb. 28); also Afterthought, to the same periodical (March 7).

1847 The Princess; A Medley.

1849 Lines in "The Examiner" for March, To -, Yo might have won the Poet's Name.

1850 In Memoriam. Contributed Here often, when child, I lay reclin'd, to "The Manchester Athe næum Album." Married Emily Sellwood at Ship lake Church, Oxfordshire, June 13. Resides a Twickenham. Appointed to succeed Wordswort as Poet Laureate (Nov.).

1851 Contributed What time I wasted Youthful Hours and Come not when I am Dead, to "The Keep sake." Sonnet To W. C. Macready. Dedicatio To the Queen in seventh ed. of Poems. Presente to the Queen as Poet Laureate (Mar. 6).

1852 Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington. The following poems were contributed to "The Examiner":—Britons guard your own (Jan. 31 Hands all Round, and The Third of Februar (Feb. 7). Hallam Tennyson b.

1853 Removes to Farringford, Freshwater,

- 4 The Charge of the Light Brigade. Lionel Tennyson b.
- 5 Mand and Other Poems. Oxford confers on Tennyson the degree of D.C.L. (May).

7 Enid and Nimuë: The True and the False.

8 Tennyson added two stanzas to the National Anthem.
They were printed in "The Times," Jan. 29.

9 The True and the False. Four Idylls of the King. Idylls of the King. The Grandmother's Apology contributed to "Once a Week" (July 16). The War, signed T., printed in "The Times," May 9. Visited Portugal with F. T. Palgrave.

 Sea-Dreams; an Idyll contributed to "Macmillan's Magazine" for Jan. Tithonus to "Cornhill" (Feb.).
 The Sailor Boy, contributed to "Victoria Regia."

Revisited the Pyrenees. Wrote Helen's Tower.

2 New edition of "Idylls of the King," with Dedication to the Prince Consort. Wrote Ode: May the First, 1862, printed in "Fraser's Magazine," June.

3 A Welcome, published March 7, on the arrival of the Princess Alexandra. Contributed Attempts at Classic Metres in Quantity to "Cornhill," Dec.

4 Enoch Arden, etc. Epitaph on the late Duchess of Kent (published in "The Court Journal," Mar. 19).

5 "A selection from the works of Alfred Tennyson," contained six new poems: The Captain (said to be founded on fact), On a Mourner, Home they brought him slain with spears, and Three Sonnets to a Coquette. A Baronetcy offered to Tennyson and refused by him. Tennyson's mother died, aged 84, at Hampstead, Feb. 21. She was buried at Highgate.

7 The Window; or, the Song of the Wrens (published 1870), and The Victim, both printed privately. Tennyson purchased the Aldworth estate, Sussex. 1868 Contributed The Victim to "Good Words" (Jan. On a Spiteful Letter to "Once a Week" (Jan. IVages to "Macmillan's Magazine" (Feb.). "1869 1866" to "Good Words" (March). Lucretin to "Macmillan's Magazine" (May). Longfello visited Tennyson.

1869 Elected an Hon, Fellow of Trin, Coll. Camb.

1869-70 The Holy Grail and Other Poems,

1871 The Last Tournament, contributed to "The Cor temporary Review" (Dec.).

1872 Gareth and Lynette, etc. To the Queen (474).

1874 A Welcome to Marie Alexandrovna, Duchess of Edinburgh. Cabinet edition of Works, containing important additions.

1875 Queen Mary: A Drama. Sonnet To the Rev. W H. Brookfield. Author's edition of Works, cor taining some important changes, 1876-7 Harold: A Drama. Prefatory Sonnet to th Nineteenth Century (March). Montenegro, to th same. To Victor Hugo, to the same (June Achilles over the Trench, to the same (August Lines on Sir John Franklin.

1878 The Revenge: A Ballad of the Flect, contributed t "The Nineteenth Century" (Mar.). Tennyson i Ireland.

1879 The Lover's Tale published. The Falcon produce at St. James's Theatre (Dec.). Midnight, Jun 30, 1879. Dedicatory Poem to the Princess Alic and The Defence of Lucknow to "The Nineteent Century" (April).

1880 Ballads and Other Poems. Contributed two Chile Songs to "St. Nicholas." Cabinet edition, I vols., completed.

1881 The Cup produced at the Lyceum. Despair to "Th Nineteenth Century" (Nov.). Becomes Vice President of the Welsh National Eisteddfod.

The Charge of the Heavy Brigade, to "Macmillan's Magazine" (March). To Virgil, "The Nineteenth Century" (Nov.). The Promise of May, produced at the Globe. Santley sings Hands all Round. Tennyson's Letter to Mr. Dawson.

Frater, Ave atque Vale, to "The Nineteenth Century" (March). Sea trip with Mr. Gladstone. Rents a house in Lower Belgrave Street, London.

The Cup and The Falcon published. Becket. Freedom, to "Macmillan's Magazine" (Dec.). New edition of Works in 7 vols. and 1 vol. Tennyson raised to the Peerage as Baron of Aldworth and Farringford. Becomes President of the Incorporated Society of Authors. The Hon. Hallam Tennyson married Miss A. G. F. Boyle.

Tiresias and Other Poems. The Fleet, to "The Times" (Apr. 23rd). To H.R.H. Princess Beatrice, to "The Times" (July 23). Vastness, to "Mac-millan's Magazine" (Nov.).

Colonial Exhibition Ode. Lionel Tennyson died at Sea, April 20.

Carmen Seculare (The Jubilee Ode), to "Mac-millan's Magazine" (Apr.).

New edition of Works in 8 vols. In this, Geraint and Enid is divided into The Marriage of Geraint, and Geraint and Enid. It reprints several poems formerly suppressed.

Demeter and Other Poems (Dec. 13). (20,000 copies sold within a week). The Throstle (previously printed in the New York "World") was contributed to "The New Review" (Oct.). In the new I vol. edition of 807 pages, first appears the title: Idylls of the King, in Twelve Books.

Song To Sleep, to "The New Review" (Mar.).

The Death of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale,

444 Handbook to Tennyson's Works.

to "The Nineteenth Century" (Feb.). 7

Lord Tennyson died at Aldworth, October 6 aged 83. He was buried in Westminster Abbe on the 12th of October.

The Death of Ænone, Akbar's Dream, and Oth Poems (October 28).

1893 Becket: A Tragedy. "Globe" 8vo. edition in vols. completed.

1894 Tennyson's Works complete in 1 vol. Crown 8v pp. 898.

Note.—To the above may be added the minor poems mentioned at foot of page 430.

INDEX.

of poems not contained in the One Volume Edition referred to in the Preface are printed in italics.

Numbers that stand first are a special reference.

LLES over the Trench, 374, ne, 95-96, 54, 58, 138, 230. hought, 195, 274, 440.

r's Dream, 378, 433, 435,

.

nder, 99.

Princess, Dedicatory

em to, 368, 442. hings will Die, 79, 80, 117.

ndra. See Welcome.

nion, 181-182, 149, 155, reontics, 144, 145, 230, 439; also Leonora.

ent Sage, The, 387-391, 59, 117, 119, 120, 169, 180, 1, 221, 252, 255, 257, 276, 7, 371, 372, 373, 377, 382, ian Nights, Recollections the, 87, 76, 77, 82, 84, 205. Il, To the Duke of, 395, 95. Armageddon, The Battle of, 61.

"Ask me no more," 245, 312.

"A Spirit haunts" (Song), 87.

"As thro' the land," 245.

"As when with downcast eyes," 98.

Attempts at Classic Metres in Quantity, 278-280, 201, 441.

Audley Court, 171, 149, 153, 177, 197.

A voice spake out of the Skies, 437.

Aylmer's Field, 208-212, 156, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 173, 201, 206, 207, 317, 342.

Balin and Balan. (See "Idylls of the King"), also 75, 376. Balliol, To the Master of, 430. Bandit's Death, The, 433-434, 54. Battle of Brunanburh, The, 374. Beatrice, To H. R. II. Princess, 395, 26, 443.

Beautiful City, 428.

Becket, 409-410, 406, 51, 139, 317, 369, 375, 398, 407, 421, 443, 444. Beggar Maid, The, 188, 149, 155. Blackbird, The, 139. Boädicea, 278. "Break, break, break," 192, 289, 149, 156, 187, 287. Bridesmaid, The, 101. "Britons, guard your own," 263-264, 156, 281, 424, 440. Brook, The, 212-215, 78, 189, 210, 216, 217, 391. Brookfield, To the Rev. W. H., 373.

Byron, on the Death of Lord,

Buonaparte, 99.

1, 116.

The, 434.

Captain, The, 185, 441. "Caress'd or chidden," 99-100. Caxton, Epitaph on, 394. Character, A, 87-88. Charge of the Light Brigade, 265-266, 212, 259, 441. Charge of the Heavy Brigade, 392, 443. Charity, 434-435, 380. "Check every outflash," 163, 439, 440. Chelsea Hospital, Stanza written for, 430. Child-songs, 273. Children's Hospital, in the, 367-368, 40, 364. Christopher North, to, 143. Chronological Table, 439-444. Church-warden and the Curate, Circumstance, 95, 37. City Child, The, 273. Clarence and Avondale, De of the Duke of, 438, 14, 443. Claribel, 77-79, 73, 82, 1 115, 363. "Clear-headed friend," 86, 143. Cleopatra, Antony to, 139. Columbus, 369, 380. "Come down, O maid," 226 "Come into the garden, Mat "Come not, when I am dea 155, 188, 440. Coming of Arthur. See "Id of the King," also 54, 242

Conclusion. See May Quee
Crossing the Bar, 438, 16, 371.
Cup, The, 410, 375, 409, 4

Cup, The, 410, 375, 409, 4443.

Daisy, The, 269-270, 212.
Dante, To, 374.
Dawn, The, 435.
Day-Dream, The, 180-181, 1155.
Dead Prophet, The, 393, 50
Dedication, A, 278, 201.
Dedication, 322, 327, 330, 329.

Defence of Lucknow, 368, 4

Dell of E——, In the, 59.

Demeter and Persephone, 4

419, 375, 377, 417, 443.

De Profundis, 370-372, 119, 339, 420.

ted House, The, 90. air, 385-387, 27, 119, 372, , 379, 380, 388, 442. not thy roseate lips outvie,"

, A, 93. ous Stroke, The, 346. 169-171, 63, 149, 202,

, 213. t and Prayer, 437.

a, Unpublished, Written vearly, 70.

as, 398-416, 43, 104, 202, , 207, 219, 224.

n of Fair Women, A, 137-, 8, 26, 102, 131, 143, 168, ner, The, 435-6. sms, 95, 103.

rin and Ava, To the Marof, 417-418.

Swan, The, 91-93, 59, 73, 74, 77, 101.

The, 188.

Spring, 393, 52, 128. rd Gray, 184, 149. Morris, 172-173, 154, 166, 168, 176, 177, 232,

-1866" and 281? 27,

To, 191-192. ore, 96, 82, 97, 143, 230. nd and America in 1782, sh War-Song, 76. and Nimuë, 322, 156, 324, , 441.

Enoch Arden, 201-208, 78, 101, 169, 209, 210, 212, 335,

Epic, The, 167, 149, 153, 321, 322, 323, 324, 330, 332.

Epilogue to Charge of Heavy Brigade, 392, 24, 377, 396, 420.

Epitaphs, 394.

Evolutionist, By an, 427, 16.

Exhibition, Ode sung at the Opening of the International, 266-267, 24, 25, 47, 259, 260, 435.

Exhibition, Opening of the Indian and Colonial, 396, 376, 443.

Experiments, 278.

Faith, 437.

Falcon, The, 410-411, 375, 409, 442, 443.

Far-far-away, 428, 59, 177, 194,

Farewell, A., 187, 149, 156.

Fatima, 123-124, 84, 85, 114, 143, 175, 272.

Fife, Duchess of, Lines on the Christening of the Daughter of, 430.

First Quarrel, The, 362-363,

Fitzgerald, To E., 384, 423.

Fleet, The, 395, 396, 24, 376, 443.

Flight, The, 391.

" Flower in the crannied wall," •277-278, 38, 259.

Flower, The, 272, 201.

Foresters, The, 414-416, 89, 399, 406, 444.

Forlorn, 422.

Fragment, A (in "The Gem"), 145, 77, 82, 83, 199, 274, Franklin, Sir John, 374, 442. "Frater Ave atque Vale," 393-394, 443.

Frederica of Hanover, To the Princess, 374.

Freedom, 395, 29, 186, 377, 424, 443.

Galahad, Sir. See Sir.

Gardener's Daughter, The, 167-169, 91, 149, 160, 163, 164, 166, 170, 176, 210, 213, 214, Gareth and Lynette, see "Idylls of the King," also 179, 442. "Gem, The" (Poems in), 144, 77, 113, 251.

Geraint and Enid, see "Idylls of the King," also 443.

God and the Universe, 437.

Godiva, 179-180, 55, 149. Golden Supper, The, 66, 64, 65, 362.

Golden Year, The, 176-177, 154, 255, 266, 267.

Goose, The, 142, 69, 140, 149. Gordon, Epitaph on General, 394.

Grandmother, The, 267-268, 201, 259, 364, 441. Grasshopper, The, 102.

Guinevere, see "Idylls of the King," also 202, 242.

Hands all Round, 395, 156,: 440, 443. Happy, 422-423, 380. Harold, 408-409, 20, 406, 4

Hamley, Prologue to Gene

Helen's Tower, 394, 441. Hendecasyllabics, 279. Here often, when a child, Hero to Leander, 103. Hesperides, The, 143, 59, 126, 134, 135.

Higher Pantheism, The, 119, 259, 296, 371, 387.

Holy Grail, The, see "Idyl the King," also 83, 202, 4 "Home they brought her V rior dead," 245, 106, 107. Home they brought him s with spears, 281, 441.

How and the Why, The, 76 370.

Idylls of the King, 319-361, 32, 43, 53, 63, 74, 112, 157, 166, 175, 178, 202, 224, 225, 226, 231, 242, 371, 377, 432, 441, 443.

Idyl, The, 165, 201, 226, 3 "If I were loved," 100.

In Memoriam, 282-298, 5, 6, 17, 18, 19, 22, 27, 28, 29, 49, 55, 59, 63, 64, 80, 89 91, 98, 102, 111, 113, 148, 155, 156, 157, 161, 175, 186, 187, 192, 193, 202, 205, 207, 209, 217,

224, 225, 228, 231, 247,

9, 303, 305, 306, 309, 313, 5, 316, 317, 320, 321, 327, 8, 359, 364, 366, 371, 372, 8, 379, 382, 391, 393, 394,

2, 269, 274, 275, 276, 277,

3, 417, 418, 420, 421, 422,

3, 427, 440.

ne Garden at Swainston, 271. ne Valley of Cauteretz, 271, ı.

el, 84, 230.

, The, 272-273, 201.

, To Professor, 418.

. K., Sonnet to, 98-99, 82. , To, 139-140, 143, 294.

lee of Queen Victoria, On e, 418, 443.

Bracken and Heather, 430, iolani, 435. , 143, 98, 230.

t, Epitaph on the uchess of, 281, 441.

cen, The, 82, 17.

Clara: Vere de Vere, 132, 9.

Clare, 185, 149, 155. of Shalott, The, 109-113,

, 109, 122, 123, 132, 143, 8, 321.

elot and Elaine, see "Idylls

the King," also III, II2, Tournament, The, Idylls of the King," also Leonine Elegiacs, 80, 85.

Leonora, see Anacreontics, 230. Letters, The, 188-189, 212.

Lilian, 83-84, 58, 75, 106, 230.

Literary Squabbles, 274, 195, 426.

Locksley Hall, 148-165, 198, 376-383, 10, 13, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 32, 130, 133, 149, 169, 172, 186, 205, 207, 209, 231, 232, 242, 251, 266, 299, 300, 328, 336, 342, 353, 361, 368, 375, 412, 436.

Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, 376-383, 7, 14, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 40, 141, 159, 160, 161, 162, 164, 169, 186, 196, 197, 209, 242, 266, 299, 300, 316, 328, 330, 339, 342, 348, 361, 390, 412, 420, 428, 436, 437, 443.

Lord of Burleigh, The, 185, 98, 134, 149, 155, 172, 197.

Lotos-Eaters, The, 134-137, 59, 90, 108, 109, 115, 126, 138, 143, 145, 177, 272.

Love and Death, 93-94.

Love and Duty, 175-176, 198-200, 154, 102, 124, 149, 164, 172, 218, 270.

Love thou thy land, 140-142, 21, 69, 149.

Lover's Tale, The, 64-66, 362, 50, 58, 61, 71, 72, 75, 139, 250, 439, 442.

Lowell, J. R., To the Memory of, 430.

Louise, Princess, Stanza for, 430. Lucretius, 218-221, 63, 82, 117, 169, 180, 202, 204, 212, 213, 217, 225, 384, 396, 442.

Macready, To W. C., 397, 440. Madeline, 86-87, 58, 230. Making of Man, The, 435. Margaret, 95, 96, 97, 143, 230. Mariana, 84-86, 59, 72, 80, 92, 101, 108, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 123, 305. Mariana in the South, 113-116, 77, 80, 82, 85, 86, 112, 123, 124, 125, 143, 305.

Marriage of Geraint, The, see "Idylls of the King," also Mary Boyle, To, 423, 13, 16. Maud, 299-318, 19, 22, 23, 25, 27, 34, 51, 52, 78, 87, 106, 128, 150, 151, 152, 154, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 202, 207, 209, 210, 211, 217, 221, 224, 225, 228, 235, 239, 242, 253, 264, 266, 271, 274, 278, 280, 320, 321, 342, 358, 412, 441. Maurice, To the Rev. F. D., 270, 86, 212, 262.

May Queen, The, 132-134, 53, 54, 97, 109, 138, 143, 207, 278, 318, 364.

Mechanophilus, 436, 16.

Memory, Ode to, 87, 57, 61, 72, 76, 83, 250, 256, 260.

Memory, 59, 102.

Me my own fate, 146, 439. Merlin and Vivien, see "Idylls of the King," also 141, 219.

Merlinandthe Gleam, 424-5, 186.

Merman, The, 95. Mermaid, The, 95.

Miller's Daughter, The, 1 123, 75, 109, 110, 127, 1 137, 138, 143, 163, 164, 1 168, 210, 214, 316.

Milton, 279.

"Mine be the strength," 99. Minnie and Winnie, 273. Montenegro, 373-374, 442.

Morte d'Arthur, see "Idylls the King," also 167, 19, 149, 166, 187, 223.

"Move eastward, happy eart." 188, 149.

"My life is full of weary day 98, 318.

Mystic, The, 103, 74, 76, 95, 102, 103, 251.

National Anthem, Stanzas ad to, 281, 441.

National Song, 76, 416. New Timon and the Poets, 7 194-195, 274, 440.

New Year's Eve; see "The M Queen."

Nimuë, Enid and, 322, 3 325, 329, 336, 351, 441. Nineteenth Century, Prefat

Sonnet to the, 372-373.

No More, 145, 251, 439.

Northern Farmer, Old Sty 268-269, 45, 46, 201, 2 259, 379.

Northern Farmer, New Sty 268-269, 46, 259.

Northern Cobbler, The, 3 365, 349, 378, 379.

ning will Die, 79-80, 117. w sleeps the crimson petal," arling Room, 144, 113.

The, 429.

one, 124-126, 109, 114, 115,

3, 178, 271, 430.

one, The Death of, 430-2, 4.

old sat Freedom ... " 140-

1, 69, 142, 149.

that 'twere possible," 304-8, 52, 124, 148, 156, 440.

οντες, 103-104, 117.

Year, The Death of the, 87, 9, 143.

ove, Love, Love, 84, 85,

3, 175.

Mourner, 140, 441.

One who affected feminate Manner, 428.

na, the Ballad of, 94-5, 73,

7, 134.

swallow, swallow," 87, 429.

Roä, 419.

The, 87, 429.

ce of Art, The, 127-132, 33-26, 79, 89, 97, 109, 125, 7, 138, 143, 174, 190, 321, assus, 426-427, 48, ng of Arthur, see "Idylls the King," also 204, 364,

, Stanza in, 430.

Pelleas and Ettarre. See "Idylls of the King."

Persia, 59, 61, 99.

Play, The, 428.

Poems by Two Brothers, 56-60, 3, 4, 16, 17, 77, 85, 91, 113, 126, 199, 205, 439.

Poems, chiefly Lyrical, 67-108, 439.

Poet, The, 88-89, 11, 42, 76, 90, 193, 272, 437.

Poet's Mind, The, 89-90, 34, 102, 437.

Poet's Song, The, 193-194, 89,

149. Poets and their Bibliographies,

396, 52.

Poets and Critics, 436-437.

Poland, 99, 13.

Politics, 428, 21.

Prefaratory Poemtomy Brother's Sonnets, 393.

Princess, The, 222-258, 13, 15, 17, 22, 25, 27, 28, 29, 40, 44,

45, 54, 55, 63, 93, 94, 97, 98, 128, 132, 137, 141, 152, 157, 158, 161, 164, 166, 171, 185, 186, 194, 199, 202, 207, 209,

210, 217, 221, 263, 271, 308,

313, 314, 317, 318, 319, 320,

330, 332, 333, 335, 336, 337, 339, 341, 342, 353, 354, 358,

364, 367, 373, 378, 380, 391,

396, 421, 422, 423, 431, 432, 435, 437, 440.

Progress of Spring, The, 423, 47.

Promise of May, The, 411-414, 22, 342, 368, 375, 376, 377, 393, 399, 409, 443.

Queen, To the, 47, 67-68, 77, 440.

Queen, To the (Epilogue to the "Idylls of the King"), 328, 396, 20, 322, 329.

390, 20, 322, 329. Queen Mary, 407-408, 406, 442.

Requiescat, 272, 201. Revenge, The, 365, 368, 442. Riflemen, form! 436, 156. Ring, The, 420-422. Ringlet, The, 273, 281, 201. Rizpah, 363-364, 164, 169, 231, 349, 380, 421.

Romney's Remorse, 425-426, 380, 432.

Rosalind, 97-98; 95, 143, 230.
Rosa Rosarum, Introductory

Verses to, 430.
Roses, The, on the Terrace, 428.

Sailor Boy, The, 272, 201, 441. St. Agnes' Eve, 182-183, 35, 148, 149, 173, 190, 227, 349, 440.

St. Simeon Stylites, 173-174, 35, 149, 154, 183, 190, 349. St. Telemachus, 432-3, 26.

Sea Dreams, 215-218, 78, 88,

156, 201, 212, 441. Sea-Fairies, The, 90, 74, 76, 83,

95, 134. Silent Voices, The, 437, 187,

Sir John Oldcastle, 368-369,

380. Sir Galahad, 183-184, 35, 149,

173, 185, 187, 322, 349.

Sir Launcelot and Queen Guir vere, 187, 149, 322, 334. Sisters, The, 126-127, 143. Sisters, The, 365-366, 372, 42

421. Skipping Rope, The, 194, 23

97, 149, 166, 194, 232, 41

Sleeping Beauty, The, 103,

Sleep, To, 416, 443. Snowdrop, The, 429.

Sonnet, A (Philosophical, 183

Sonnet, A (1830), 102.

Specimen of a Translation of Iliad, 280.
Spinster's Sweet-Arts, The, 3

Spinster's Sweet-Arts, The, 3 Spiteful Letter, The, 273-2 45, 442.

Song of the Wrens, The, 280 Song, "The Winds, etc.," 8 Song, "A Spirit Haunts," 8 Song (Volume of 1833), 137. Stratford de Redcliffe, Lo Supposed Confessions of Second-rate Sensitive Mi 80-82, 17, 76, 77, 83, 91, 97, 117, 118, 377, 378.

Swallow Song, 87, 171, 429. "Sweet and Low," 245, 312

Talking Oak, The, 174-175, 133, 149, 164, 172, 189, 2 315.

"Tears, idle tears," 250-2 44, 59, 63, 128, 138, 1 171, 177, 227, 228, 370. ryson, Life of, 1-7.

Position in the History of nglish Poetry, 7-14.

Characteristics, 14-48. I. Personal, 14-15, 223.

2. Religious, 15-21. 3. Political and Views, 21-29. 4(a). As Poet of Nature,

29-33, 122. (b). As Artist, 33-43, 225.

5. Humour, 43-46.

6. As Poet Laureate, 46-48. Mystic Temperament, 62, , 103, 207, 243, 251, 252, 7, 423. ne form, the form alone,"

-100, 71.

here are three things," 146, ne splendour falls," 245. re is no land like England, 6, ne winds, as at their hour," d of February, 1852, The, 3-264, 156, 259, 265, 303, ee Sonnets to a Coquette, -100, 71, 441.

ostle, The, 429, 87, 443. hy voice is heard," 245. buctoo, 60-64, 4, 56, 58, 9, 65, 70, 72, 75, 145, 250, 1, 260, 439.

sias, 384, 375, 376, 377, 51, onus, 178-179, 102, 128, 59, 172, 201, 220, 384, 441.

To ---, 86, 76, 143. . . .

To -, after reading a Life and Letters, 191, 155, 440.

To Alfred Tennyson, my grand-

To One who ran down the English, 428.

To-morrow, 392.

Tourney, The, 436.

Translations of Homer, On, 278-279, 80.

Tribute, The, Stanzas in, 304-308, 124, 156, 52, 148.

True and the False, The, 322, 325, 329, 336, 351, 441.

Two Voices, The, 116-120, 146-147, 17, 26, 59, 69, 80, 98, 149, 155, 169, 185, 252, 256, 276, 296, 308, 309, 371, 377, 378, 386, 388, 390.

Ulysses, 177-178, 126, 136, 149, 154, 172, 180, 185, 384. Ulysses, To, 423.

Vastness, 419-420, 16, 316, 335, 377, 443.

Victim, The, 274, 441.

Victor Hugo, To, 373-374, 442. Virgil, To, 392-3, 443.

Village Wife, The; or, the Entail, 367, 380.

Vision of Sin, The, 189-191, 35, 36, 136, 149, 156.

Voice and the Peak, The, 259. Voyage, The, 185-187, 201, 273, 424.

Voyage of Maeldune, The, 369-370, 205.

Wages, 274-275, 259, 442. Walking to the Mail, 172, 149, 153, 166, 177, 380. "Wan Sculptor, weepest thou," 99-100. Wanderer, The, 436. War, The, 156, 436, 441. Ward, Wm. George, 429. Welcome to Alexandra, A, 267, 201, 259, 441. Welcome to H.R.H. Marie of the Duke of, 259-263, 60, 105, 106, 212, 440. "What time I wasted," I 440.

Alexandrovna, A, 267, 259,

366, 442.

Wellington, Ode on the Dea

Will, 270, 212.

Will Waterproof's Lyrical Mo logue, 184-185, 6, 45, 1 149, 155, 166.

Window, The; or, The Song the Wrens, 280, 51, 441. Wreck, The, 384-385, 246, 3 391, 425.

"You ask me why, tho' ill ease," 140-141, 69, 149.

Luce, Morton.

DATE DUE
SEP 3 0 1994
1-7
APK 29 1998
MAY 2 9 2001
FEB 0 6 2006 SEP 2 9 2008
DEMCO, INC. 38-2931

